Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

General Certificate of Secondary Education

1. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales what additional resources are being made available to local education authorities specifically to reduce the size of classes taking the new general certificate of secondary education syllabus.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): It is for local education authorities to manage the resources available for education. Funding secondary schools for the GCSE is clearly a high priority, and I am pleased to see that some authorities have already made additional resources available for this purpose. So indeed has the Welsh Office, which has made available over £3 million for purposes specifically related to the introduction of the GCSE.

Mr. Rowlands: Is the Minister aware that no teachers or headmasters, and only a very few parents, believe that we can introduce this syllabus, with classes of 30-plus for mainstream subjects, although that is what the majority of our children will face when the new system is introduced? Will he therefore look again at the pupil-teacher ratios for the introduction of the scheme, because they are vital to the success of the introduction of a new syllabus and examination system?

Mr. Roberts: I wholly disagree with the hon. Gentleman. I believe that teachers are showing the will and commitment that is needed to introduce the new examination. As for the pupil-teacher ratio, in the hon. Gentleman's own county, Mid Glamorgan, the pupil-teacher ratio is 16·7.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My hon. Friend will be aware of the parental concern, even cynicism. Is he satisfied that local councils will deploy these additional resources at the chalk face?

Mr. Roberts: I have already said that two local authorities have announced their plans, and I have exhorted local authorities to do so. There has been some concern about books and materials. The Government are making available this year £5,000, on average, per secondary school in Wales. A similar sum will be available over the next two years. That is in addition to the capitation allowances that are to be provided by the local authorities.

Mr. Rogers: Is the Minister aware that the extra £5,000 that is to be given to each secondary school is quite pathetic? The general certificate of secondary education is a new philosophy which will depend upon project work, more laboratory work and continual assessment. The resources that are being given to it are quite inadequate. When will the Government properly fund this particular examination?

Mr. Roberts: We are funding it properly. I have already announced what extra finance is available from the Welsh Office specifically for this examination. I remind the House that in Wales about £659·5 million is available to local authorities for education in the current year.

Mr. Raffan: Will my right hon. Friend seriously consider allocating further resources over the next three years to ensure that teachers can develop the new range of skills that are required to supervise and evaluate GCSE course work, bearing in mind that to release a teacher for one day costs a local education authority at least £50?

Mr. Roberts: In the amount that I have announced as being available from the Welsh Office, there is a grant scheme for in-service training, teacher training seminars and syllabus-specific training. We have sought to meet practically every reasonable requirement for additional finance for this examination.

Mr. Barry Jones: Would not the biggest boost for this important examination be more teachers? Is not the crucial mechanism for the funding of the school system the rate support grant? We demand a generous rate support grant settlement. Would not a means of helping education authorities in Wales be a switch of cash from private schools to the budgets of the local education authorities? Would that not give the new examination a better start, because the Minister is throwing more cash at the private schools than he is giving extra case to the new examination?

Mr. Roberts: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's last remark. The amount given to private schools is over £1 million, but I have just added it up, and the total that we have given to the new examinaton is £3 million. That is additional to the support given through the rate support grant, which, under this Government, has increased from £601·8 million in 1979-80 to £628·5 million in 1984-85, at a time of falling pupil numbers. Therefore, expenditure per pupil has increased over that period by £100 in real terms.

Welsh Water Authority

2. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the chairman of the Welsh water authority to discuss the authority's budget.

9. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to meet the chairman of the Welsh Water Authority to discuss with him the decision by the Government not to proceed with the plans to privatise the water industry in the next Session of Parliament.

The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of the Welsh water authority regularly to discuss a variety of issues. I last saw him on 15 July.

Mr. Wigley: As the Welsh water authority recently announced a record £12·3 million profit, is it not scandalous that water rates in Wales should be increased next year by 9 per cent., an average of £10 per household, at a time when the Government are increasing pensions by only 1 per cent.? Does that not put an unacceptable burden on the lowly paid in Wales?

Mr. Robinson: No final decisions have yet been taken on the charges that are likely to be levied by the Welsh water authority in the coming year. The £12·3 million profit has been used to finance an increase in the capital programme from £41 million in 1984-85 to £54 million in 1985-86.

Mr. Powell: We have no objection to the coupling of questions, but one expects the Minister to reply to the second question. My question relates to the discussions with the chairman of the Welsh water authority about the Government's decision. On 9 June, only six weeks ago, the Minister was arguing for the privatisation of the water industry. Now the Government have changed their mind. It is no good the Minister shaking his head. If he reads Hansard for 9 June he will see what he said about privatisation. As the Government have changed their mind, one would have expected a Welsh Office Minister to make a statement to the House so that Labour Members in particular Welsh Members, could advocate what they wanted with regard to the water authorities, not what the Minister wants. In future, if the Minister is minded to couple my question with another, will he ensure that he answers it properly?

Mr. Robinson: In my reply I said that I met
"the chairman of the Welsh water authority regularly to discuss a variety of issues."
These include the current status of water privatisation. As the hon. Members knows, having been in the Chamber for the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, the Government have no plans to change their policy towards water privatisation. They have simply announced that we shall not be introducing legislation in the coming Session.

Mr. Raffan: I welcome the extra £30 million of capital expenditure by the Welsh water authority in 1984-85, but will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the chairman's foreword to his annual report, which says that it sets the authority on the road to even higher levels of capital spending over the next three years?

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend is right to point that out. The chairman is very keen that capital investment by the Welsh water authority in the water industry should continue to go on apace. The chairman's report sums up the position well.

Mr. Alex Carlile: When the Minister last met the chairman to talk about the water authority's budget, did he discuss providing extra money to enable the Welsh water authority to monitor the caesium levels in sheep within its area? If not, will he give an assurance that Welsh Members will be given all the information necessary to enable them to judge the caesium levels in sheep in Wales? Furthermore, will he ensure that that includes all the statistical data in the Welsh Office's possession?

Mr. Robinson: That was not on the agenda at my meeting with the chairman of the Welsh water authority, but I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that we are publishing all the relevant information that is available on that topic.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I rise with great deference to intervene in Welsh Question Time, but why do the latest figures for England include the caesium level for brown trout, rainbow trout——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going very wide of the question.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that, Mr. Speaker, but——

Mr. Speaker: The trouble is, I cannot accept it.

Mr. Hughes: Why did the Minister not discuss the absence of any figures from the Welsh Office on the caesium levels in fish? It got figures on cabbage, rhubarb and gooseberries. Why not on fish?

Mr. Robinson: We are publishing all the statistics available to us.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: It may be premature to question my hon. Friend about the greater flexibility of capital raising after privatisation, but in the meanwhile can he confirm that he will issue firm advice to the Welsh water authority on the importance of ensuring that future rate increases are not significantly higher than the prevailing rate of inflation?

Mr. Robinson: I know that the water authority will do everything in its power to keep down rate increases to the lowest level possible.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: The Minister will be aware that more than 30,000 houses in Wales are served by unadopted sewers. Will he say when the Government will introduce measures to correct that, in line with their consultation paper, "Water and Sewerage Law"?

Mr. Robinson: As the hon. Gentleman has said, we have issued a consultation paper and we are now studying the responses that we have received.

Mr. Barry Jones: Is it not true that a privatised authority would not be a viable enterprise? Would not a commercialised water industry be disastrous for the country? Do not the Government's plans excite the hostility of tens of thousands of anglers in the Principality? There is no mandate in Wales for the privatisation of the water industry, and the party that proposes privatisation will be electorally wiped out.

Mr. Robinson: It is very likely that we shall be seeking a mandate for the privatisation of the water authorities. We certainly believe that the authorities have a great future as a privatised industry, as they will then be able to raise much-needed funding on the capital markets. There is every possibility that the Welsh water authority will be able to expand any recreational activities after privatisation.

Labour Statistics

3. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest unadjusted figures for unemployment in (a) Newport, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales; what were the equivalent figures in May 1979; and what has been the percentage increase in each case.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): On 12 June 1986 the total numbers of unemployed claimants in the Newport travel-to-work area, Gwent and Wales, were 12,775, 29,229 and 173,708, respectively. Unadjusted figures for 1979 are not available on a comparable basis.

Mr. Hughes: Has the Secretary of State recently looked at the population statistics for Newport? They show that the population is apparently declining in numbers. Moreover, there is evidence that it is the young who are leaving. Is that any wonder when, for a week or so, the local press has been full of reports of our young people frequenting amusement arcades, with all the debauchery that is associated with them? Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that last Saturday I received a deputation of ladies, who presented me with a petition containing horrific details about glue sniffing in one area of the town? After more than seven years in office, is it not time that the Government started to think about providing some real jobs for young people?

Mr. Edwards: I am glad to say that Gwent is one of the areas that has proved to be successful in attracting a wide range of new industries. The kind of approach adopted by the hon. Gentleman to these matters will hardly encourage investment of the kind that we all want.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the continued creation of new jobs is important, not the old dreary ritual of despair that we keep getting from the Opposition? Is not one of the best pointers the latest survey from the Cardiff chamber of commerce, published in this morning's Western Mail? That survey, carried out among its members throughout south Wales, shows that approximately two thirds expect to increase their business in the coming year. Does my right hon. Friend also agree that we ought not to ignore the fact that over 20 per cent. of them report difficulties in recruiting suitable labour, especially skilled tradesmen?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that my hon. Friend is quite right. There are other favourable indications, such as a very high level of factory allocations by Government agencies this year. Inquiries to the small business unit are at an all-time record high and there is continued success in attracting a high proportion of the United Kingdom's total inward investment.

Mr. Anderson: Does the Secretary of State tell the House that the welcome reduction in inflation is wholly due to the success of the Government's policy and that the alarming increase in unemployment is wholly due to external factors?

Mr. Edwards: I make no claims of the kind just put into my mouth. We are attracting a high level of investment in new jobs in Wales, and there are some signs that unemployment is stabilising and marginally improving relative to the situation elsewhere in the United Kingdom. That suggests that at least the long decline of the basic industries from which we have suffered for so long is coming to an end and that the Welsh economy is more and more dependent on the large number of new companies that we attracted in recent years and on the large number of new small businesses that are starting up.

Kidney Patients

4. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many new kidney patients per million head of population received dialysis treatment in 1979 and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In 1985 approximately 56 new patients per million population received dialysis treatment in Wales, compared with 19 new patients per million population in 1979.

Mr. Favell: I trust that Welsh Members will forgive me for venturing into health questions, but it is a subject in which I am interested. Can my hon. Friend tell me whether the wonderful improvement in kidney dialysis provision in Wales is due to a partnership between the private health sector and the National Health Service? Elsewhere in the United Kingdom, could not scarce resources as well as lives be saved by following the excellent example of Wales?

Mr. Robinson: I welcome my hon. Friend's question. This has been an outstandingly successful experiment in Carmarthen and in Bangor. In order to see what has been achieved in terms of co-operation between the public and private sectors in health care provision, I have written to my colleagues in the Scottish Office, the Northern Ireland Office and in England to inform them of what has been done and to urge them to look at it if they are so minded.

Mr. Coleman: I welcome the increase in the number of dialysis treatments in Wales, but can the Minister guarantee that this will continue, especially in the light of the Western Mail report this morning, which talks of shortages of doctors in Welsh hospitals? It says that authorities have to pay as much as £1,000 a week for locums and that young junior doctors have to work 104 hours a week. What will he do about that to ensure that the Health Service in Wales can continue successfully?

Mr. Robinson: Not only can I guarantee to the hon. Gentleman that the service will be maintained, but I can tell him that at the moment we are working on plans to extend the service.

A55–A548 Delyn (Link Road)

5. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to construct a link road between the A55 and the A548 in Delyn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Raffan: As Delyn borough council regards this as the most urgent priority road scheme in the borough, and as industrial growth will be hampered until the link is created, will my hon. Friend consider giving financial help to Clwyd county council to enable it to carry out its promised evaluation study of the proposed link road as soon as possible?

Mr. Roberts: As my hon. Friend will realise, the link road which he proposes, which is supported by Delyn borough council, is a matter for Clwyd county council. If and when the county council produces proposals, they will be considered in the usual way for support by means of the transport supplementary grant. I understand that Clwyd is prepared to carry out an evaluation study in due course, but that it gives higher priority to the second Dee crossing.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Apart from the A55, will there be a statement on Thursday about the building of a second Severn crossing? Have the Government rejected the report of the Select Committee on Transport on estuarial crossings, which calls for their abolition——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am reluctant to interrupt a Front-Bench spokesman, but does this relate to the A55?

Mr. Hughes: It relates to the Government's road programme.

Mr. Speaker: The question relates to a link road between the A55 and the A548.

Mr. Hughes: Is it not time that the Government employed some plumbers to stop the perpetual leaks? At least they should start to show a little respect for the House of Commons.

Mr. Roberts: Whatever may be said about a second Severn crossing, it will not go over the A55 or the A548.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Minister agree that the A55, with or without the link road, is only one part of the roads necessary for a reasonable east-west crossing in Wales? Will he give immediate consideration to giving greater priority to the mid-Wales east-west crossing?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. and learned Gentleman will have read "Roads in Wales 1985" and "Roads in Wales —the 1990s and Beyond." We are consulting on those proposals, which refer in part to mid-Wales.

European Regional Development Fund

6. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total value of grants which Wales has received from the European regional development fund in each of the past three years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Net commitments in 1983, 1984 and 1985 amounted to £45·1 million, £63 million, and £54·9 million, respectively. Allocations to Wales in 1986 to date total £12·6 million, with applications for a further £37·2 million of aid under consideration in Brussels.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend believe that the size of the grants has been sufficiently well publicised? If not, what steps is he taking to ensure that the public are made aware of the extent of the assistance that Wales receives from the fund?

Mr. Edwards: The assistance has made a valuable contribution to the provision of infrastructure. The most recent example was the announcement by the Commission of financial support for the splendid new innovation centre on the campus of Swansea university, which was opened by the Prince of Wales a fortnight ago. Every opportunity is taken to publicise such support through press notices and by other means. When I was at the university last week the principal expressed his gratitude for the support and said how important it was.

Mr. Wigley: As one of the most important European grants for Gwynnedd — that to the lamb and sheep farmers—is being lost because of the radioactivity ban, thus causing an immense cash flow crisis for the farmers, when will the Secretary of State make a clear and detailed statement on compensation for those farmers? When will he come out of his bunker and come to Gwynnedd—he has not yet been there, although the crisis has continued for a month—and meet those farmers, who are facing a desperate time?

Mr. Edwards: I understand the importance of the questions being asked, which is why we are taking urgent steps to ensure that the areas are reduced as quickly as possible. But this does not arise under a question about the ERDF.

Transport Act 1985

7. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest assessment of the effect upon transport services in Wales of the operation of the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The evidence available so far suggests that the new arrangements will help to check the decline in the bus industry and encourage the provision of public transport services better suited to the needs of passengers.

Dr. Marek: Does the Minister appreciate that there is great anxiety about the problem in Wales and that there is great apprehension that evening stage carriage services and the problems of bussing children to and from school will become much worse as a result of the Transport Act? If he does not agree that that will happen, what guarantees can he give on those two points?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman is being unduly alarmist. He must consider the whole picture, not just of registered commercial services, but of the subsidised services as well. He will know that no county in Wales has yet evaluated the tenders for subsidised services, but they all seem confident that they will be able to buy additional services through the subsidy tender system, and that includes Clwyd. I understand that Clwyd proposed to award contracts on the basis of competitive tenders, including those for school transport.

Housing (Multiple Occupation)

10. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what guidance he will give to local authorities to protect the safety of those in houses of multiple occupation.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend has recently issued detailed guidance to local authorities on 22 May about their powers to control houses in multiple occupation and protect the safety of the people who live in them.

Mr. Anderson: The Minister must be aware from representations from the Institution of Environmental Health Officers and those working in the field of their continued concern about the real dangers to the health and safety of that vulnerable section of our population who live in houses in mulitiple occupation. Will he at least undertake to look sympathetically at the Bill that has been introduced by Baroness Vickers in the other place, which would impose duties on local authorities to enforce certain standards for health and safety and would provide regular inspections by local authorities of houses in multiple occupation?

Mr. Robinson: We are aware of the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Indeed, many of its provisions contain sympathetic and sensible ideas. However, our current legislation is adequate. Indeed, we have introduced some new legislation fairly recently and we want to see how that works before taking the matter further.

Welsh Water Authority

11. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what current steps are being taken by his Department to prepare the Welsh water authority for privatisation.

Mr. Mark Robinson: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said in his statement to the House on 3 July, the Government intend to proceed with water privatisation as soon as practicable. Preparatory work to that end is continuing.

Mr. Davies: I take it from that answer that the Minister is confirming that staff in the Welsh Office are now carrying out preparatory work. Will he confirm that staff of the Welsh water authority are being directed to carry out preparatory work? Is not that expenditure of public money and use of public servants' time fundamentally dishonest when neither the Welsh Office nor the Government have any mandate for their privatisation proposals? Will the Minister now take steps to direct staff in his Department to cease forthwith action on privatisation and direct the Welsh water authority to do the same? Will he confirm that the Government's privatisation proposals will form a centrepiece in the Government's manifesto at the next election?

Mr. Robinson: It is very likely that our privatisation proposals will form a central part of our manifesto. The hon. Gentleman has great first-hand experience of water as a result of his valiant attempt to push the Welsh Eight off the rocks during the regatta last week.

However, the answers to his other questions are no, Sir.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Can the Minister tell the House something about the debt of the Welsh water authority? Are we to understand that if the industry is privatised the debt will be wiped out, but if it stays in public ownership the debt will remain?

Mr. Robinson: There will be a major restructuring to take account of privatisation, but until that time comes we have no plans to change the capital structure of the water authority.

School Visits

12. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales which schools in Wales he has visited from November 1985 to June 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has visited Pembroke comprehensive school; I have visited Cardiff high school, while my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson), visited Malpas Church in Wales junior school in Newport.

Mr. Jones: Will the Secretary of State show more commitment to the local education authority schools in Wales? Is the Under-Secretary aware that the Social Security Bill may well eliminate some 27,000 free school meals in Wales, yet the community health experts and nutritionists are already worried about the low nutrition levels of many Welsh families? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that many Welsh children depend for their nutrition upon free school meals? Bearing in mind nutritionists' worries, what will the Government do? Surely the Bill is wrong and will hit Welsh schoolchildren from the poorest families.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman might be right in saying that a certain number of children will lose free school meals under the Social Security Bill, but an even greater number will benefit from the alternative scheme. We are totally committed to the maintained sector.

Mr. Grist: Is my hon. Friend aware that he will be a most welcome visitor to the Howardian high school in my constituency? That school is under threat of closure by the south Glamorgan authority, although it is one of the most successful in the county.

Mr. Roberts: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know of his close connection with the Howardian high school. He will understand that there is scope for the rationalisation of secondary school provision, particularly because of the fall in pupil numbers. Local education authorities make proposals that are the subject of consultation. A closure proposal is referred ultimately to

Hospital Waiting Lists

13. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on hospital waiting lists in the Cynon Valley and Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Representations on matters relating to waiting lists have been received from many parts of the Principality, including Cynon Valley. I indicated the extent of our response to the hon. Lady in replying to her question on 30 June.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Minister aware that there are far fewer general surgeons in post than when the Government came to power in 1979, and that there are now fewer consultant surgeons per head of population in Britain than in any other Western country? Does that not nail the lie perpetuated by the Government that they have put more into the National Health Service? Does the Minister agree with the president of the Royal College of Surgeons, who said recently:

"Wards are being closed, beds are being closed, surgeons are being told to reduce their operating sessions. Many of us, including myself, have been criticised for doing too much work. That is unbelievable. The prime reason is finance."

Mr. Robinson: I am pleased to tell the hon. Lady that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State opened no fewer than two new hospitals on Friday. Staff directly concerned with front-line patient care, including the categories to which the hon. Lady referred, have increased by 12·5 per cent. since 1979, nursing staff are up by 10 per cent., medical and dental staff are up by 13 per cent.—an overall increase of 18 per cent. I am astonished that the hon. Lady should refer to falling resources, because expenditure that we have made available to the Health Service since we came to power has increased by no less than 26 per cent. in real terms.

Welsh Joint Education Committee

15. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to meet the Welsh Joint Education Committee.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I attended the annual meeting of the Welsh Joint Education Committee on 4 July 1986 and set out Government policy over a range of educational issues of current concern in Wales. I have placed a copy of my speech in the Library.

Mr. Jones: Did my hon. Friend take the opportunity to raise the important TVEI programme with the WJEC?

Mr. Roberts: I touched upon the subject and was delighted to tell the WJEC of my pride over the fact that every local education authority in Wales is involved in TVEI. We have announced an extension of the TVEI scheme and have published the White Paper "Working Together — Education and Training" which relates to TVEI.

Mr. Wigley: At the meeting to which the Minister referred, Councillor Emyr Currie-Jones asked him why the suggested plan for the Welsh language, given to the Welsh Office by the Welsh Joint Education Committee in November, had received no response. Why has the Welsh Office been sitting on that plan for seven months?

Mr. Roberts: The WJEC has certainly put forward proposals on that matter. However, they involve a somewhat complex machinery of committees and sub-committees and a complex programme of work. What the WJEC has not done is to meet the requirements spelt out by my right hon. Friend in his letter to it of 23 July last year.

Mr. Barry Jones: The Minister is being unnecessarily laggardly about this matter. Was it not a major error of judgment to attack the WJEC while failing to indicate the financial resources available to it? There is a bitter taste in the mouths of people in Wales because of the Minister's mistake. Should he not apologise to the WJEC?

Mr. Roberts: My intention was to spur on the WJEC, and I think that what I said achieved the desired effect. After all, it is a year since my right hon. Friend wrote to it, and I have openly regretted the fact that we have not been able to make more progress together in such a long time.

I think that the spur that I gave to the WJEC has been successful and that we shall advance more quickly in the near future. One reason why we have not advanced as quickly as we might has been the stress that the WJEC has placed on resources, whereas I have been stressing the need for a proper framework for discussion.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Halls

19. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what criteria the Commissioners use in the provision of funds for church halls.

Sir William van Straubenzee (The Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing Church Commissioners): The Church Commissioners do not provide funds specifically for church halls. However, they do make grants to dioceses for the provision of church buildings in new housing areas, and that could include church halls.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Do the Church Commissioners share my concern at the number of unsightly annexes to churches? Do they think that the Church should remain free from planning control? Does my hon. Friend recall that in France and Italy clerical iconoclasts have been restrained by municipal authorities?

Sir William van Straubenzee: If that were the position, it would be a matter for anxiety. However, I am happy to reassure my hon. Friend completely by telling him that all church buildings are subject to normal planning control. I think that he has in mind exemption from listing building control. If a particular case offends his susceptibilities—and he may be right, I do not know—he has to blame those who gave the planning consent, not the Church authorities.

Mr. Favell: Does my hon. Friend agree that too many parish churches confine the use of their church halls to their congregations? Would it not be far better if parish churches were prepared to provide, for example, meals for the elderly and social activities for the elderly and for under-privileged children? After all, many committed Christians would be only too pleased to undertake such excellent work if their vicar were to give a lead.

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am afraid that I must avoid taking any responsibility for the work of individual parishes. I mean no discourtesy to my hon. Friend, and if he has a specific case in mind I shall willingly pass it on to the diocesan bishop concerned.

Buildings (Expenditure)

20. Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will make a statement on the current level of Church Commissioners' expenditure on Church buildings.

Sir Willam van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners' expenditure on church buildings during the year ending 31 December 1985 totalled £3·3 million.

Mr. Chapman: As the Church raises about £55 million —whether through the Church Commissioners or parish fund-raising—to conserve and preserve its architectural heritage, and as the Church has a 3:1 better record in preserving its heritage than owners of secular buildings, does my hon. Friend agree that that is a matter of commendation and that it would be foolish to seek to change the laws related to listed buildings consent by getting rid of the ecclesiastical exemption? We should leave things exactly as they are.

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. As he knows, the matter is under the scrutiny of the Select Committee on the Environment. It will be interesting to see what the Committee contributes. In the meanwhile, I am able to confirm that congregations provide £55 million each year for the upkeep and maintenance of their buildings, compared to about £4 million received in the form of state aid.

Parsonage Homes

21. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many clergy occupy parsonage homes maintained partly or wholly with funds provided by the Church Commissioners; if any scheme exists to assist clergy to purchase their homes; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee: There were 8,223 in 1985. The Church of England pensions board also operates a scheme to assist clergymen to purchase a home on retirement and the commissioners contribute financially to it.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I recognise that the Church of England, through the commissioners, is generous in its provision of clergy housing. I understand that £8·8 million was provided in 1985, which was 7p in each pound. Does my hon. Friend agree that many clergy would like the flexibility of movement that would come from owning their own homes? Could not some help be given to them to allow them to buy their own homes, recognising that at present they have to live on the job and are contacted regularly at home day in and day out? They do a magnificent job, but they could do with some flexibility.

Sir William van Straubenzee: This issue was last considered as recently as 1982, before my hon. Friend joined the General Synod. A paper was circulated at that time. It was clear that the ownership of houses by the serving clergy would have a serious effect on deployment, and there was little desire among the clergy for such a change. The emphasis is put upon making it infinitely easier than it ever was before to purchase a house, or to be provided with retirement housing, once active service has come to an end.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ethnic Monitoring

23. Mr. Janner asked the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what information he has as to the monitoring of the sex and ethnic origin of staff at the Palace of Westminster and applicants for employment at the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. A. J. Beith (A House of Commons Commissioner): The House of Commons is an equal opportunity employer and, following arrangements agreed for the Civil Service, a programme for monitoring the ethnic origins of staff of the House is to be conducted in the near future. The details of this programme are subject to discussion between management and trade union representatives. There is currently no monitoring of the sex of staff of the House or of applicants for employment.

Mr. Janner: Can the hon. Gentleman say why the House of Commons, of all places, has not yet complied with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission? Surely it should be for the House to set an example to others and not to drag behind in what is an important area of equal opportunities, in which it is not good enough merely to say that the House is an equal opportunities employer and then to continue to operate what appears to me from casual observation to be a sexist and racist organisation in which employees do not reach the top unless they are from the majority?

Mr. Beith: The House of Commons Commission is making every effort to implement the code of practice. Indeed, it is statutorily bound to follow the Civil Service in doing so. The timetable by which it is carrying out the proposals is based upon adhering to that statutory obligation and consulting the trade union representatives within the House. I know of no basis for the hon. and learned Gentleman's wild charge that the House is either racist or sexist in the way in which it carries out its employment responsibilities.

Mr. Stokes: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that for jobs in the Palace of Westminster the only criteria should be suitability for the post and loyalty to this country?

Mr. Beith: Perhaps I should remind the hon. Gentleman that the Commission is responsible only for its employees and not for the entire staff in the Palace of Westminster. A number of separate organisations employ staff here. The features to which the hon. Gentleman has referred are, of course, part of our employment policy. We have a duty to ensure that there is no discrimination on the grounds of race or sex in employment within the House.

Mrs. Shields: As there is a House of Commons barber, does the Commission have any plans for establishing a ladies' hairdresser?

Mr. Beith: I am delighted that, from the Liberal Bench, we may have increased the demand for ladies' hairdressing facilities within the House. However, I must tell my hon. Friend that the matter is one for the Services Committee. Were she to address her question to the Leader of the House, I am sure that he could give her an account of the lengthy discussions that have taken place on this subject.

Mr. Harris: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that many hon. Members think that the question on the Order Paper appears thoroughly racist and sexist, and that we should have nothing to do with discrimination, one way or the other?

Mr. Beith: The House of Commons Commission is carrying out its proper duties to ensure that there is no discrimination in employment. It is also seeking to ensure, by the monitoring process that has been agreed for the Civil Service generally, that it has full knowledge of whether people of particular ethnic groups and the two sexes have appropriate opportunities for promotion within the service of the House.

Parliaments (Morning Sittings)

24. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal what information he has as to which Parliaments in the EEC have morning sittings; and if he will make a statement.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I understand that the following EC countries have arrangements for morning parliamentary sittings, either on a regular or an occasional basis: Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy and Spain.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Recognising that I am not the greatest supporter of the European Assembly, may I suggest that our House should consider sitting, at least occasionally, in the morning, in addition to the regular Friday morning sittings. It costs far too much to run the House of Commons. We are sitting far too late into the night, although, happily, not as much as in the past.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's observation overlooks the fact that many hon. Members recall the period when the House sat in the morning on an experimental basis. That experiment has never led to an informed demand for its renewal.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the Leader of the House recollect that one of the problems with the late Dick Crossman's ill-starred attempts to bring in morning sittings lay with the Law Officers? Is there not a general problem with the accountability of the Law Officers? Should there not be an opportunity for the Attorney-General to explain why he gave immunity to Miss Colette Bowe, when on 30 January he told us that he was first informed of the involvement of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) on 22 January?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is ingenious but wide of the original question.

Mr. Biffen: I stayed here till the closing minutes on Friday to hear the hon. Gentleman. I now realise with what sadness I missed his contribution. I am glad to take note of it now. It would be quite inappropriate for me to follow the hon. Gentleman in that question, except to say that he seems to have had much more difficulty than the late Dick Crossman did with the Law Officers.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the difficulties that the House would face with morning sittings is that Governments do not always have a large majority and that, if a Government's majority were much smaller, Government Members would be required to start all the House's Committees? In addition, Scottish Members would be required to start all the Scottish Committees and the Scottish Grand Committee. Therefore, most of the time, they would be excluded from attending the morning sittings.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. When the Crossman experiment took place, it was recognised that because Ministers would often be doing work within the Ministry, no votes could take place during morning sittings. Therefore, they were all left over to the evening, when some quite esoteric subjects suddenly found that they had the most extraordinary turn-out because of their proximity to a three-line Whip. I refer to the future of the Oswestry market, which was under consideration. /Interruption./ That happens to be true, and it is for any historian to judge. Once the practices of this House are disturbed, we cannot suppose that automatically we have an improved position as a consequence.

Mr. Williams: Does the Leader of the House not find it more than slightly surprising that the request for morning sittings has come from, of all people, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Brunivels), who, after all, was eager to bounce to his feet claiming the discredit for having sank the morning sitting that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) should have had on a Friday?

Mr. Biffen: I would find it surprising if the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) had not torpedoed himself last Friday.

Mr. Wallace: Many hon. Members feel that there is insufficient time for debating private Member's motions and Bills. Will the Leader of the House consider having an experiment, even one morning a week, and if hon. Members did not turn up to debate their own material, the experiment could be abandoned?

Mr. Biffen: The House should be careful before engaging the whole bureaucracy of morning sittings to meet such a narrow point as that suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Line of Route

25. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy if he will review the policy of curtailing the normal line of route for a week on the occasions when Her Majesty's Government invite foreign dignitaries to speak in the Royal Gallery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: No, Sir.

Mr. Taylor: As this is the people's Parliament, and not the Government's Parliament, does my right hon. Friend not think that it is unfair, unreasonable and unkind that groups of schoolchildren and pensioners who have saved up for a long time to come to Parliament for pre-arranged visits should have their tours disrupted because of one of these occasions? Cannot such meetings be held in a Committee room? As the last three visits have been by representatives of Spain, France and Italy, and none have been by representatives of the Commonwealth, will my right hon. Friend tell us exactly who selects the people who come to these privileged occasions?

Mr. Biffen: That is a touching reference by my hon. Friend to the Commonwealth. Doubtless he will elaborate at some time on who he thinks would be suitable to make an address in the Royal Gallery. The Heads of State who are invited here for this accolade are relatively few. There have been about 10 during the past 20-odd years. The Government, of course, give the invitation, but they do so knowing that they speak for the British people at large. It would be a poor day if that proper degree of pomp and ceremony, which should be associated with Government were relegated because of schoolchildren's parties.

Mr. Williams: The right hon. Gentleman is missing the important point. Many hon. Members have experienced this problem showing parties around this year. It must be borne in mind that these groups of pensioners, schoolchildren and so on are coming on a once in a lifetime visit arranged months in advance and, in many cases, at considerable expense. They deserve some consideration. Because it seems that the only rooms that need to be closed are the Royal Robing Room the Royal Gallery and the Prince's Chamber, it is inconceivable that we cannot arrange these visits so as not to close the line of route for a full week in advance.

Mr. Biffen: That point is, of course, frequently considered by those who are responsible for looking after such visits [Interruption.] There are various serious responsibilities concerning security—a problem that has been compounded in recent years. I know that it is inconvenient that we must close down the line of route for about a week, but I do not belive that that period would reasonably be shortened without giving rise to other hazards, which I do not believe the House would wish to undertake.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Stipends

22. Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what was the total amount paid out by the Church Commissioners in 1985 for the stipends of bishops and clergy; what information he has as to the amount contributed by church congregations for this purpose; how these figures compared in real terms with those for 1975; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee (The Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing Church Commissioners): The total was £76·3 million in 1985. This included £33·9 million from church congregations. The figures for 1975 — when payment arrangements were different — were £21·3 million and £1·4 million respectively. That is an increase in real terms of 30 per cent. and 769 per cent.

Mr. Greenway: Are not those figures impressive? Will my hon. Friend give the comparative size of the congregations who contributed the sums mentioned in 1975? What was the average size of the congregation per ordained clergyman then compared with now? Does he think that the congregations get value for money?

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners do not keep statistics of the type requested, because they are not responsible for those matters. I was able to give only the broad figures for which my hon. Friend asked, and I am grateful to him, because they show two things. First, the gross figures are substantial. Secondly, the fact that contributions from church congregations have increased by 769 per cent. in that comparatively short period shows the enormous increase in voluntary giving that is willingly undertaken.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Do bishops get a secretarial allowance?

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners pay the salaries of secretarial help for bishops.

WALES

Foreign Languages (O-Level Results)

16. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of 16-year-old school pupils in Wales achieve grades A to C at O-level in foreign languages.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): An answer cannot be given in the precise terms requested. In 1985 there were 13,566 16-year old pupils in Welsh schools. In the same year there were 4,141 passes at grades A to C in foreign languages. However, some pupils taking or re-taking O-levels were over 16, and some sat more than one foreign language examination.

Mr. Grist: Does my hon. Friend nevertheless agree that the overall figures for Wales, as in the rest of the United Kingdom, are deeply disturbing and quite extraordinarily poor in a European context? What will his Department do to try to persuade young people of the value of foreign languages in economic as well as in cultural terms?

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend will know that my right hon. Friends have published a draft statement of policy on foreign languages in the school curriculum. I agree that there is plenty of scope for further teaching and learning of foreign languages. There is spare teaching capacity in foreign languages and new opportunities are presented by the advanced secondary courses. Further, many sixth forms undertaking foreign languages are comparatively empty.

Single Payments

3.30 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about single payments of supplementary benefit.

I first simply set some facts before the House. Between 1974 and 1979, under the previous Government, what were then called exceptional needs payments rose from 0·8 million to 1·1 million, and their cost from £11·5 million to £38 million. These numbers were already a matter of concern, and one of the objectives of the review carried out from 1976 to 1978 was better control of such payments.

In 1980 the present Government made changes which it was hoped would overcome the problem, and which indeed took account of the recommendations of that earlier review. Initially they appeared to have had some success, but by 1983 the number of payments was virtually double the 1979 figure, at nearly 2 million, and expenditure had almost quadrupled, to over £140 million. By 1985 both figures had more than doubled again—to more than 4 million payments at a cost of over £300 million—and the growth shows no sign of diminishing.

This trend cannot be explained by the increase in the number of claimants. The rate of payments per claimant has itself more than doubled since 1979. Nor can it be explained by changes in weekly benefit levels. The weekly scale rates rose in real terms by some 6 per cent. between November 1978 and November 1985. There have also been other significant improvements—for example, in some of the payments for children; in the amount and scope of regular additional heating payments, especially for pensioners; and in the rules concerning benefit for the long-term sick and disabled.

Against that background, our firm conclusion in the recent social security review was that the present system of single payments could be neither justified nor sustained. It is incompatible with sensible planning and efficient administration, as is shown by the fact that, although only some 5 per cent. of supplementary benefit expenditure goes into single payments, it accounts for nearly 50 per cent. of all supplementary benefit decisions and over 50 per cent. of appeal hearings.

More fundamentally, it is clearly not achieving what Parliament intended. Despite elaborate regulations and adjudication, wide discrepancies occur from one area to another. It is increasingly perceived as unfair by others on incomes little or no higher than supplementary benefit, to whom no comparable help is available. There is unacceptable scope for exploitation and abuse, yet at the same time insufficient flexibility to meet the real needs of genuine claimants.

As the House knows, it is for these reasons that the Government have brought forward in the current Social Security Bill proposals for an improved structure of regular weekly income support, coupled with a clearly distinct social fund designed to give appropriate help with genuine special occasional needs in a more practical, manageable and flexible way. We believe those proposals are essential to the proper working of the benefit system as a whole.

Meanwhile, however, the growing unworkability of the present single payments system could not simply be ignored. In February, therefore, we put for consultation to the Social Security Advisory Committee draft regulations making a number of changes within the existing structure, as an interim measure. The principal elements were to restrict furniture and bedding payments to more clearly defined categories of need; paying particular attention to the needs of pensioners, the sick and disabled, and those leaving hospital after a long stay; to introduce time rules for repeat claims for items of furniture; to set standard sums for specific items such as cookers, and standard amounts to cover a range of miscellaneous household items which can at present be individually listed; and to introduce a standard pattern of help with maternity needs.

We have now given very careful consideration to the committee's report, which is laid before Parliament today, together with my right hon. Friend's response. The report clearly recognises the difficulties to which the Government are seeking to respond. It also recognises the effort that has been made to take account of the needs of those thought to be most vulnerable, and welcomes in principle the introduction of standard payments and lump sums. While making it plain that the committee does not endorse the proposals as a whole, it nevertheless suggests a number of specific modifications which it would wish to see if the Government should decide to proceed.

For the reasons that I have given, the Government continue to believe that action is needed. Moreover, those considerations have been greatly strengthened by the continued escalation of single payments in recent months. The most recent figures, for the four weeks to 3 June, were equivalent to an annual rate of 5½ million payments and at least £400 million. Many local authorities and other bodies are mounting campaigns to stimulate further claims, for example by circulating leaflets containing extensive "tick lists" of items under some such slogan as "Closing Down Sale". Apart from anything else, the consequent growing burden on DHSS offices, despite the additional staff that we are making available, is seriously detrimental to the interests of claimants themselves.

The Government therefore propose to proceed with new regulations, but with a number of important modifications to meet detailed suggestions which the Committee has made. These include further steps to protect the position of refugees, women who have been subject to domestic violence, and young people leaving local authority care; a lengthening of the qualifying period for maternity payments; the extension of lump sum payments for miscellaneous items to childless claimants setting up home; and, perhaps most important, a doubling of that lump sum from £25 to £50 for each dependant. Regulations incorporating those changes have been laid today, with a view to bringing them into effect on 11 August.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Does it not indicate the extreme and justified embarrassment of the Government that they have for weeks put off laying this measure—one of the harshest in all their years in office—until after the Newcastle-under-Lyme by-election, and that they are now trying to rush it through in the last weeks before the recess? Indeed, I understand that they are proposing to table it for debate on Wednesday—the day of the royal wedding—in order, they hope, to minimise public awareness. Is it not characteristic of the Government that they have chosen a day of national festivities to hammer the poor with extra rates payments of £300 million, and now cuts in single payments, which, on the figures that the Minister gave today, amount to no less than £180 million?

Will the Minister acknowledge that supplementary benefit levels are insufficient to pay for – and were never intended to pay for – major items such as furniture, bedding, blankets, cookers, fridges and clothes, and that the effect of these regulations must therefore be to push many families more deeply into poverty?

Does the Minister accept that cutting back expenditure on single payments to the 1984 level, as the Government intend, is wholly arbitrary and it fails to take account of the causes of the growth in demand for single payments, namely, the rise in unemployment, the growing number of long-term claimants, who inevitably have higher needs, and the steady erosion of claimants' other resources, such as savings or spouse's earnings?

Will the Minister acknowledge that the Government's SSAC said:

"The representations we received suggest that while some of this growth may be attributable to increasing awareness among claimants of their legal rights it may equally be accounted for by the existence of a reservoir of unmet need which is only now being recognised. The Government's response has been to propose much tighter conditions of eligibility and a greatly limited range of items. This response, because it seeks to attack the symptoms (increased public expenditure) without fully analysing the causes, must necessarily run the risk of causing widespread hardship amongst claimants who are already living at what is generally recognised as the poverty level."?

Those are the committee's words.

Will the Minister acknowledge that his criticism today of local authority take-up campaigns implies a lack of concern about the real problem of under-claiming that exists and shows that in the Government's view a high level of unmet need is acceptable? Will he confirm that the SSAC opposes these plans to reduce help for buying furniture, for meeting the costs of newly born babies and for making urgent payments to people in need? Will he confirm that the definition of chronically sick and physically, or mentally, disabled is being made much more restrictive in order to limit claims? Will the Minister confirm that the Government's revised list for help with furniture now omits tables, chairs, cupboards, floor coverings and carpets? Will he acknowledge that financing the repair or replacement of those items without assistance or recompense will chiefly hit lone-parents and unemployed people? Is he aware that scrapping regulation 28, by which back payments can be made where benefit has been underpaid, will have damaging effects, as will withdrawing protection from pensioners and many other vulnerable claimants during extremely cold weather?

Is the Minister aware that the modifications to the original draft regulations which he has made today, in the face of deep hostility from the SSAC are minuscule and cosmetic? Is he aware that these regulations will cause intense and widespread hardship? Is he aware that this is the latest and, perhaps, the harshest measure to be brought in by the Government, taking the country back to a restrictive and inadequately financed system of poor law support, which we in the Labour party unequivocally reject?

Mr. Newton: It will not surprise the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to know that I accept little of what he said. We have made it clear that we expect about £100 million to be saved in a full year compared with the expenditure in 1985-86. However, it is difficult to make firm estimates in this area at present precisely because of the rapid escalation in expenditure that is going on.

I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's suggestions about the creation of intense and widespread hardship. As the Social Security Advisory Committee acknowledged I did not attempt to disguise the fact that it does not endorse the proposals as a whole – a deliberate and careful attempt has been made to protect those whom we see to be priority claimants and cases, to ensure that they continue to receive help.

Let me give the House one example to set against what the hon. Gentleman said. A lone-parent, with two children, setting up home after a marriage breakdown will still be able to get help of about £800 to assist in that connection. That is not unreasonable. It is a sensible provision for those most in need.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The Government gave it all away to the rich last Thursday, on the Finance Bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) must not interrupt from a sedentary position.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Government do not care.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Newton: In view of the glowing terms in which the hon. Member for Oldham, West referred to the take-up campaigns of local authorities, I should tell the House that I have in my hand the "tick list" that was submitted by a claimant in the Strathclyde region. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) will listen for a moment, he may – [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Workington cannot contain himself, I shall have to ask him to leave, and I should not want to do that.

Mr. Newton: I have in my hand the "tick list" that was submitted by a claimant in the Strathclyde region, listing literally dozens of items for which she was making a claim, starting with four single beds, bedding for the whole family, three fires, three fire guards and four hot-water bottles. Also, I have the letter that that claimant wrote to the local DHSS office a few days later, which said that her social worker had been to visit her and told her that she could claim, had filled in the form, posted it and had given her a copy. The claimant wrote:

"Most of the things I don't need, so I am writing to let you know the items I do need, and could you ignore the letters he has sent?"

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, North): Does my hon. Friend not regard the multi-purpose forms to which he referred in his opening statement, which is similar to the one issued by the North British Housing Association, which begins

"Dear Manager, Pay me a grant for these things", as a total abuse of the purpose of the single payment? Is it not a fact that this kind of leaflet and this kind of approach clog up the whole system of both the normal payment and the appeals procedure, to the detriment of the very people whom the system was designed to help? In the light of what has been happening during the last 12 months, is there not an unanswerable case for the new system that my hon. Friend is proposing?

Mr. Newton: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have some examples here, including the one that the Oldham social services department is circulating under the heading:

"Claim it while you can."

One local office in Sheffield, serving 21,000 claimants, recently received 4,000 claims for bedding within a few weeks and 2,500 claims for furniture within four days. What is happening is clogging up the system, is detrimental to the interests of claimants themselves and needs to be checked.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does not this latest attempt to shift the benefit goal posts augur badly for the new family credit system, which will no doubt be abolished if too many claimants take it up? Does the Minister not agree that this is just grinding the poor further into the ground? How will the poor contrast this decision to save £100 million with the decision to give away £1·5 billion in tax cuts? How will the poor contrast this decision to try to pick up a few petty offences with the Government's failure to do anything about racketeers and profiteers who are abusing hundreds of millions of pounds of housing benefit?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that family credit has nothing whatever to do with this, except in one sense, namely, that the object of family credit is to do more to help low-paid families in work and to create a fairer system between those in low-paid employment and those on benefit. That is part of our purpose with these proposals.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is my hon. Friend aware that the state of affairs that he has described cannot be allowed to continue and that his proposals will be warmly welcomed on this side of the House? Does he not think that the abuse of the single payments system, as deomonstrated by the campaigns in the benefit shops that have been set up all over the country, illustrates the logic and the fairness of incorporating these resources into the proposed income support scheme? Would that not ensure that what is, after all, taxpayers' money goes to the people who are really in need and not to those who simply know how to manipulate the system?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree with every word that he has said.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): How does the Minister have the brass neck to come to the House and make this statement, thereby saving £100 million, which will rob the poor of money that they desperately need for items with which to exist, and blame the poor for claiming what is theirs by right? How many Treasury Ministers have attacked sleazy accountants for running seminars to advise people on how to save considerable sums of money through tax avoidance schemes? How many Ministers have blamed the rich for exerting their rights and claiming their rights by every legitimate means? Why does the hon. Gentleman come to the House to attack those who are properly advising the poor on their rights and how to claim them? Is it not a disgrace to come to the House with this statement which is robbing the poor of £100 million, when the Government have given millions upon millions to the richest people, who do not deserve it and do not need it?

Mr. Newton: I am saying no more than that the system is manifestly lending itself to manipulation and exploitation on a scale beyond what Parliament ever intended, and that is not in the interests of claimants and is leading to delays in the proper processing of genuinely urgent applications. I do not believe that any Government would continue to live with this situation.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Will my hon. Friend remind the Labour party that single payments do not drop off trees, and that the recipients rely on their neighbours to provide them?

Mr. Newton: I agree with my hon. Friend. One of the problems here is the perceived unfairness by those who cannot obtain these payments so readily. It is right to try to restore the balance between different groups in their claims on the taxpayer.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I represent an area where an increasing number of people are living on supplementary benefit, and where there has been a consistent rise in unemployment and all to do with it. Why are the Government not merely taking this £100 million from the poor people who need it, but not allowing an appeals procedure for the social fund so that an appeal can be made against any decisions taken?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman's question does not arise from the statement but will be the subject of debate in the House later this week.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): For all this synthetic excitement from the Labour Benches, is it not clear from the figures that my hon. Friend gave, showing that the number of claims has doubled in two years, that the taxpayer is being ripped off by this gross abuse of the system? What checks are carried out before claims are made, and afterwards to see that the money is properly spent?

Mr. Newton: Our staff attempt to carry out proper checks, but not the least of the difficulties with the growing exploitation of the system and the burden that it is placing on officers is that it becomes increasingly difficult to administer the system properly. We are not prepared to tolerate that.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): The Minister said that he had a circular from the social services department at Oldham, which has—correctly—been circulated to clients and those making claims for assistance. Why has the hon. Gentleman been so illogical as to claim that the system is clogged up—as it is, in Oldham—but not to deal with it properly by ensuring that there are sufficient staff to deal with the problem? Has not the lack of staff been pointed out time and again by the unions representing staff working in social service departments? Why has the hon. Gentleman sought instead to clear up the backlog by choking off those who are correctly asking for single payments, while, happily for him, by coincidence, reducing costs to the Government by taking £100 million from the poorest people?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that we are in the process of putting a substantial number of additional staff into the social security system—some 5,000 in all—compared with what had been planned, because of the pressures on that system. I say to the House in all seriousness, because I believe that, in the end, it would be the view that Ministers in another Government would have had to take, that no system can sensibly cope with this kind of payment rising at the rate of 1 million payments a year.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, in making these regrettable but necessary changes, he has followed the advice of the SSAC on many of the most salient points? Furthermore, if these changes are made in advance of the full implementation of the social fund, what will be the bridging arrangements between now and then?

Mr. Newton: As I made clear in the statement, the measures are seen as a means of ensuring the continued workability of the existing single payments system, pending the introduction of the social fund. That is a sensible approach, and it underlines the Government's proposals.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Does the Minister accept that most applicants for such payments come from the areas of greatest deprivation, which have the highest numbers of long-term unemployed people? Does he not realise that they require certain items to furnish their houses? Does the hon. Gentleman not have any constituency experience of people coming to him for help? Would it not be better to deal with what is clogging up the system instead of abolishing it altogether?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman would be wrong to think that there is a clear correlation between deprivation and the number of applicants. One of the least satisfactory aspects of the system is the extraordinary variation to be found between areas when measured in payments per claimant. The rate of single payments per thousand claimants varies from 481 in one region to 1,540 in another. In Scotland, which will be of interest to the hon. Gentleman, the number of claimants per 100 unemployed varies from 38 in some offices to 291 elsewhere. Such variations must call into question the fairness of the present system and whether it is being operated sensibly.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does my hon. Friend agree that an eightfold increase in the value of the payments between 1979 and today is wholly unacceptable? Does he further agree that, as a general rule, such payments should be used for unforeseeable and exceptional needs, and that there is considerable evidence that claims are being made that do not fall within the general purpose of the regulations?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is right. That is one reason why I am concerned that the interests of those claimants with genuine, unforeseeable, one-off needs are in danger of being swamped by some of the things that are happening throughout the country.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow Provan): Many of us appreciate the fact that the regulations are to be debated on Wednesday, the day of the royal wedding. That must have been thought up by the Government's dirty tricks department, but may I ask a constructive question? I accept that there are abuses. The Minister referred to Strathclyde, and I should not be surprised if the letter referred to the office covering my constituency. Some of us recognise that there is a problem, but would it not be better to hold constructive talks with local authority representatives, with a view to looking at the take-up campaigns, which are legitimate, and at the abuses? One difficulty is that regional directors do not have the political know-how to deal with such situations.

Mr. Newton: We try to talk constructively to local authorities when they are considering take-up campaigns, to ensure that they are conducted responsibly and in a well targeted way, but that does not work with all local authorities, and some are easier to talk to than others.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Does my hon. Friend agree that voluntary insulation groups have done a good job in insulating annually about 500,000 homes of the most disadvantaged members of society, often with help from a single payment? In view of his statement, can he offer any reassurance about the future of voluntary insulation groups?

Mr. Newton: The regulations that have been laid today do not affect single payments for draught-proofing. I have made it clear several times that we would not wish to make changes in that respect without being assured that there were adequate alternative arrangements to ensure the continuation and, indeed, development of those very valuable groups. We are discussing that with the other Departments involved.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Instead of attacking local authorities and claimants' organisations which legitimately seek money from the DHSS, why does the Minster not improve the advice services of the DHSS? Is it not an abuse to say that those who are eligible to claim money, and legitimately do so, will henceforth be prevented from doing so for single payments? Will the Minister tell us when he last went through the indignity of trying to get a single payment to buy a secondhand cooker or an old bed or clothing or furniture? Has he been through that indignity? It is a disgrace that this week, when millions will be spent on the royal wedding, the Minister should come here to make the poor pay for the tax cuts and for the wedding that we are about to see.

Mr. Newton: We have significantly improved the DHSS advice services, and we attach great importance to that. Everyone recognises the value of the DHSS Freephone service, which is now operating throughout the country. One of the things welcomed by the Social Security Advisory Committee is the proposed introduction of standard lump sums for such items as cookers. That will improve the position of claimants.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Bearing in mind that this is an Opposition day, I shall allow questions to continue for a further five minutes, and then we must move on.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most welcome aspects of these regulations is the standardisation of payments? I hope he will agree that that will deal with a number of the racketeers who batten on to people who receive single payments. The effect of the regulations could be that more money will reach the people who need it.

Mr. Newton: I certainly agree. I think the Social Security Advisory Committee has recognised that our proposals are a real gain and will help to avoid some of the problems to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the Minister recall that earlier this year, in the Select Committee on Social Services, he warned us when we were pressing for more money to help disabled people and to provide care for old people that that could be achieved only at the expense of other items? In view of the Government's climb down on invalid care allowance and the passing of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, are these regulations being rushed through so that the poor will have to pay for those two provisions? It is a matter of Peter paying Paul, and of the poor being clobbered on this occasion.

Mr. Newton: No, it is not. I know that the hon. Gentleman's anxiety is totally genuine, but I had hoped he would recognise the trouble that we have taken in the regulations to protect sick and disabled people, about whom he and we are concerned.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Can my hon. Friend tell the House what proportion of those who are eligible to make single payment claims are doing so, and of those what proportion are repeat payments? I assure my hon. Friend that his statement will be welcomed by a large number of people.

Mr. Newton: Off the cuff I cannot give my hon. Friend the figures that he requires. It is certainly the case that alongside the regional and local office variations about which I spoke there are some astonishing variations between the numbers of claimants who receive a single payment, the numbers who receive many single payments and those who receive no payments at all.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): The Minister said that refugees would not be affected by this robbery. Is he aware that in my area the vast majority affected by these cuts will be the industrial refugees, who are in that position because of the chaos inflicted by Government policies? Is he aware of the inquisition that people have to go through to get these single payments?

Mr. Newton: It is right that for single payments and for weekly payments of supplementary benefit local offices should seek to check that claims are genuine. I have not so far spoken about the removal of the so-called suitable alternative furnished accommodation rule, which has been generally welcomed. That rule was widely seen as disadvantaging many unemployed people who were trying to move out of board-and-lodging accommodation.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my hon. Friend accept that the careful and thrifty people in my constituency deeply resent these single payments, the absence of checks and the fact that beds are supplied every 18 months? Leicester city council has launched a scurrilous campaign aimed at giving more to just one section of society, while those who are entitled to more do not get it because the council does not care about them.

Mr. Newton: I note what my hon. Friend says, and I am not entirely surprised in view of the amount that Leicester city council must have expended in producing this "Closing Down Sale" leaflet, which is littered with massive "tick lists". I am sure that that will arouse in many people just the kind of resentment about which my hon. Friend has spoken.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): The regulations about which the Minister complains were introduced by this Government. Are we to assume that the upsurge in the number of single payment claims is a reflection of the social and economic policies that the Government are pursuing? Is the Minister asking the House to believe that the one example that he cited from Strathclyde—he did not tell us whether the person would have been eligible for the items claimed—convinced him to do what he is proposing?

Mr. Newton: If some social workers are filling in forms for people, getting the people to sign them and sending them off, and if it then emerges within a matter of hours that the claimants themselves did not perceive that they had those needs, that in itself is a form of manipulation of the poor. I do not suggest that all social workers do that.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Will the Minister accept that as unemployment stretches into years, inevitably household goods wear our and cannot be replaced on the amounts available through supplementary benefit? He is adding to the great hardship already suffered by some people. What happens when the cash limited social fund runs out part way through a financial year? Do people have to reapply at the beginning of the next financial year and hope that their names are further up the list?

Mr. Newton: As I have said, the social fund will be a matter for debate later in the week. The anxiety reflected in the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question is precisely why we have more generous rules in these regulations for those who have been on benefit for more than a year.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Will the Minister accept that already many thousands of people do not get the single payments that they need because of the way in which the regulations operate? His statement is an appalling attack on the poorest and the most deprived sections of the community. The Government should accept that they are the guilty ones, because they created the unemployment and the deprivation. The Secretary of State for Social Services should use his influence in the Cabinet to deal with the real problems facing the country. The Government should not pursue this attack on poor and deprived people.

Mr. Newton: The statement means that as soon as the new regulations are in effect those claimants with genuine needs that ought to be met will have a better chance of getting them dealt with promptly and efficiently, because their claims will not be buried in this torrent of deliberately stimulated claims.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Will the Minister confirm the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen), that he, the Minister, voted for the regulations about which he is now so critical? Can the Minister explain to claimants the difference between those who take full advantage of the Chancellor's tax laws by employing a well-paid and well-heeled accountant, and social security claimants who are advised by well qualified social workers so that they can take advantage, of which they have more need, of these regulations?

Mr. Newton: It is appropriate for the Government to make sure that tax laws and social security laws operate in the way that they were intended, and that they are not wide open to abuse. Successive Governments have done that. We are determined to tackle abuse on both fronts.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why does the Minister not listen to his own electorate? Does he not realise that millions of his supporters believe that by penalising poor people and giving money to the rich under Finance Bills the Government are wrong? They believe that that is wrong, and they object. Why do Government Back Benchers not stand up and represent middle-class opinion? Those people feel deeply ashamed of what the Government are doing. They know that the Government are wrong, and in all conscience they often write to their Members of Parliament and tell them that they object. They go to Conservative conferences to object, and yet the Government ignore them. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make a speech.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Government ignore them because they do not care.

Mr. Newton: I shall confine myself to saying that I had not hitherto seen the hon. Gentleman as a classic representative of middle-class opinion.

Business of the House

4.10 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement about the business for Wednesday 23 July. The business for that day will now be as follows:

Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Social Security Bill.

Motion relating to the Supplementary Benefit (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations.

Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Wages Bill and the Agriculture Bill and Lords amendments to the Dockyard Services Bill.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I note the change of business that has just been announced, and I have three questions to ask the Leader of the House. First, is not his statement further evidence of the truly chaotic state of affairs in the planning of Government business? Although we welcome the Government's capitulation on the amendments proposed in the other place to the Dockyard Services Bill, does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that four Bills and an order on one day is an abuse of the legislative process?

Secondly, on the supplementary benefits order that we have just been discussing, which sharply limits single payments to the very poorest, does not the right hon. Gentleman understand how offensive it is that this squalid measure and the Social Services Bill that precedes it should be timed to coincide with a glittering state occasion, when the focus of the press will inevitably be not on the House of Commons but on Westminster abbey?

Thirdly, since the right hon. Gentleman obviously believes that all relevant business must be completed before the recess, will he reconsider the date of the summer recess so that the House can debate the major report from the Select Committee on Defence on the Westland affair, which is due to be published at 11 o'clock on Thursday?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman questions the nature of the business. I do not accept his strictures and I answer him in the same terms as I did the Leader of the Opposition.

As to the second point on the supplementary benefits order, given the nature of business for this week, Wednesday was the most convenient day to debate it. It is perverse constantly to draw attention to the royal wedding in relation to business which we should conduct anyway as a working Parliament.

Finally, I note the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety that Parliament should sit beyond this week and into the future. The motion for the recess will soon be tabled. It will be debatable, and the right hon. Gentleman can put his points then.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Am I right in thinking that the royal wedding is in the morning?

Mr. Biffen: Yes.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: If so, what is the difficulty for right hon. and hon. Members to attend and debate the business in this place?

Mr. Biffen: I have shrunk from making that monumentally simple observation because I hoped that hon. Members would conclude that this line of argument was farcical.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Given the continuing havoc in the Commonwealth following our failure to impose sanctions, does the Leader of the House agree that before the House rises on Friday there should be an urgent statement on the matter in the House? Would that not give Her Majesty's Government the opportunity to answer the serious allegations made yesterday in The Sunday Times?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of the hon. Gentleman's request and will pass it to the appropriate quarter.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): When my right hon. Friend considers the changes that may or may not be made in this week's business, will he remember that we would rather work late this week, finish on Friday and have our holidays with our children, who in Scotland have been on holiday for some weeks?

Mr. Biffen: That is a very good home-spun observation which will undoubtedly be put to the test when we debate the recess motion.

Mr. Robert Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Has the right hon. Gentleman had a chance to see the Channel 4 television broadcast which went out on Thursday night entitled, "All the Prime Minister's Men"——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are dealing with the business for this week.

Mr. Wareing: I am coming to that, Mr. Speaker. In view of the allegations made in that programme that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) issued a document to the Cabinet entitled, "It took a riot", following the Toxteth riot in Liverpool——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This widens the debate very much beyond the change of business for Wednesday.

Mr. Wareing: I shall come directly to the point. Is it not time that we had an urgent debate on the murder of Merseyside, which was opted for by the Government as a result of the response to that report in the Cabinet by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs?

Mr. Biffen: I did not see that television programme. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government have enough business on for the remainder of this week. I cannot accommodate the debate that he suggests, but he will have the chance, as a private Member, to raise the matter on Thursday or Friday.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I again remind the House that this is an Opposition day and that such exchanges take time out of that period? I shall call those hon. Members who have been rising, provided that they keep their questions brief and to the point.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On the Dockyard Services Bill, will the Leader of the House do the penance of reading the speech of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) on Friday? Is it not a classic case of filibustering? Before he talks about my torpedoing myself, will he admit, uncynically, that the Government had continued——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is just what I was hoping would not happen. The hon. Gentleman's question has nothing to do with the business statement.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that he has responsibilities to the House as a whole, not simply to the Government of which he is a member? If there is a strong demand, certainly from the Opposition, for the report of the Select Committee on Defence on Westland to be debated, will he recognise the need for this to be seriously considered? Is it not scandalous that the House will go into recess for 10 or 11 weeks while a report will be published and widely debated in the media, yet hon. Members will have no opportunity to debate it in the House?

Mr. Biffen: It is because I have a responsibility to the House as a whole that I believe we should go into recess on Friday. If the hon. Gentleman genuinely disagrees with the proposition, doubtless he will vote against it, as will others.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I pre-empt further questions on that report, which is not due to be published until Thursday and so will not be affected by this statement.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Home Secretary to make an early statement on the appalling conditions which many visitors at Heathrow are facing? Many men, women and children are being kept for up to 24 hours without food or drink. Others have been taken to police cells and to prisons. I remind the hon. Gentleman that they have committed no crimes. The position at Heathrow is a disgrace. It does great damage to our efforts to promote Britain as a tourist centre and it is an example of grotesque maladministration by the Home Office.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raised the matter with me on Thursday, when I said that I would have the matter investigated. I stand by those words and I also stand by the comments I made then—that I disagreed with the premise on which the hon. Gentleman based his remarks.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The right hon. Gentleman will be aware of the many attempts to secure a statement on the Stalker affair by the Home Secretary or the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Will he prevail upon either of those gentlemen to make such a statement so that the matter will not rest in abeyance until 21 October?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the inquiry is continuing and that, under United Kingdom practice, it would be improper for a statement to be made now.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Since on Wednesday the House will be debating the Social Security Bill, which prevents claimants from having access to tribunals and making appeals, which will cause those who have lost limbs in industrial accidents to lose anything up to 14 per cent. in compensation, and which is an all-out onslaught on working people and supplementary benefits, would it not be a good idea if, before the debate started, the Leader of the House encouraged the Minister responsible to tell the House what supplementary benefits and grants will be included in the Civil List for the royal family in the following year and give an estimate of the cost of the royal wedding on that day?

Mr. Biffen: That is a proposition which I note and which enables us all to understand that much further the political philosophy of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): May we have a statement on Wednesday on the grave situation that has developed in north Wales in relation to the radioactive lamb ban which, during the last few days, has shown that sheep will be stuck on the mountains in north Wales into the winter with no grazing and it is unlikely that they will be able to be moved? We have not yet had a statement from the Secretary of State for Wales on that matter and it will be appalling if the House goes into the summer recess without having had an opportunity to discuss that.

Mr. Biffen: I have a constituency interest in the sheep trade in north Wales and therefore I pay proper regard to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I am sorry that the matter could not be ventilated at Welsh questions today but I shall certainly take up the point with my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that an incident occurred last Friday which causes concern, and which certainly causes me concern, which affected a Member of Parliament, and which needs brief investigation and a report to the House? My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was followed outside the precincts of the House and his movements tracked by a non-Member. It seems that reports of his movements were made. That is the sort of thing that happens in Eastern Europe. Why was this? Why did it take place? To whom was the report made and why?

Mr. Biffen: I am not clear what responsibility I may have in this matter, but it would be appropriate if the right hon. Gentleman set all the details out in a letter and we could then decide who is the responsible recipient.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I realise that this is a slightly unusual point of order and I equally realise, as the Leader of the House told us on Thursday, that the timing of the publication of the report of the Select Committee on Defence on the Westland scandal is a matter for the Committee's Chairman. However, I am convinced that the Chairman has done everything in his power to expedite the publication of that report and that is why I bring the matter to you.

I submit that for three reasons we are in a unique situation which requires your involvement, Mr. Speaker. After all, the House is going into recess for three months. Secondly, the Attorney-General, one of the most senior figures in our legal system, may find that he has to resign if it emerges that he, in his unique role, approved the charade of setting up a leak inquiry after having been told that that leak had been authorised by a senior fellow member of the Cabinet. Thirdly, it is unique because if the Attorney-General finds himself in such a situation, the Prime Minister becomes exposed and vulnerable.

Therefore, I submit that we cannot wait three months before the House determines the culpability of the Attorney-General and the Prime Minister, particularly as during those three months hon. Members will be deprived of the protection of the privileges of Parliament.

For those reasons, it is in everyone's interests that the House should have the maximum time to study all the evidence, not just to have the report in front of them, before Thursday's Prime Minister's questions and the debates on the motion for the summer Adjournment and the Consolidated Fund.

In that unusual combination of circumstances, and as you are the custodian of the interests of the House, Mr. Speaker, is there any way in which the weight of your office can assist the efforts that I know have already been made by the Chairman to secure the earliest possible publication of the report, possibly the day or even the evening before, so that hon. Members can study it overnight?

Mr. Speaker: The point of order really is not for me. As the right hon. Gentleman said, this is entirely a matter for the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence and I have no influence over when he decides to lay his report. If he wants to lay it before Thursday, presumably he can do so.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I raise briefly a matter about which you have shown some sympathy on previous occasions when matters have been debated outside, in broadcasting and the press? It goes without saying that the report of the Select Committee on Defence will receive extensive coverage. No doubt we shall switch on our television sets and see hon. Members debating with each other and so on. Yet for 10 or 11 weeks the House will not be able to debate the most important document on Government administration that has been published, which everyone recognises is virtually a time-bomb ticking away under the Government. Is not that a grotesque situation?

Mr. Speaker: The solution is in the hands of the House. The summer Adjournment motion will be debated on Thursday. The simple issue is whether the House adjourns or does not adjourn. If the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members feel strongly about this matter, the solution is in their hands. I cannot do anything about that.

Rate Support Grants Bill

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order, of which I have given you notice, concerns the Rate Support Grants Bill, which is due for its Report stage and Third Reading this evening. There is a distinct possibility that the Bill will be certified as a money Bill under the terms of the Parliament Act 1911, the practical effects of which would be to prevent the other place from detailed consideration of the Bill.

The fact of that possibility has come as a bolt from the blue. It was never anticipated by us. It is especially surprising since the Bill amends two other Acts, the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and the Local Government Finance Act 1982, neither of which was certified.

You well know, Mr. Speaker, that much of the work in Committee and on the Floor of the House on the details of Bills is about pressing Ministers to reconsider parts of measures and often seeking undertakings from Ministers that, if they cannot deal conclusively with a matter in this place, it will be dealt with in the other place when the Bill goes for its Committee stage there. That has been the assumption on which Labour Members have worked in Committee. In fairness, I believe that Ministers have also worked on that assumption and I think this is as much a surprise to them as to us. The Committee worked on the basis that the Bill would be fully debated in the other place. Had we not worked on that assumption, the whole tenor of its Committee stage would have been different.

My first point is that it is usually obvious from the start when a Bill is to be certified as a money Bill or one for aids and supplies. The most obvious example is the Finance Bill, which everyone accepts from the beginning is either a money Bill or one for aids and supplies. Where it is not obvious—it was not obvious either to us or to Ministers—would it not have been reasonable for the House and for members of the Committee to have been forewarned that the Bill was likely to be certified if it left the House of Commons in substantially the same form as it was introduced? A failure to give that information means that the proceedings upstairs and on the Floor of the House are prejudiced.

My second point concerns the merits of certifying the Bill. I realise that you, Mr. Speaker, will not make a decision on this matter until after Report and Third Reading, but I respectfully ask you take into account the following points. First, section 1(2) of the Parliament Act speaks of a Bill being certified when it deals with the imposition of charges out of funds provided by Parliament or their variation. The Bill does not deal with the imposition of charges, no money resolution was attached to it and in no way does it affect the amount paid out of funds levied by Parliament by way of rate support grant. It deal only with its detailed allocation and a narrow aspect of that—multipliers.

Secondly, the Parliament Act makes it clear that a Bill can be certified only if it deals with a matter of the imposition of charges out of funds voted by Parliament or certain other matters not relevant here. Even if you decide that the application of multipliers in the Bill does amount to an imposition of a charge, which seems to construe that provision of the Parliament Act very widely indeed, I submit that other matters are dealt with by the Bill which, on any reading, are nothing whatever to do with the imposition of money provided by Parliament, nor are they subordinate to that.

I refer you particularly, Mr. Speaker, but not exclusively, to paragraphs 8, 9 and 13 of schedule 1. Those paragraphs affect generally the relationship between local government, central Government and Ministers, and the degree to which Ministers have to explain decisions that they have made by paragraphs 8 and 9. A duty on Ministers to provide Parliament and local government with the considerations leading to various determinations is substantially watered down so that the duty in future will be for the Secretary of State to provide information only "as he thinks desirable."

Under paragraph 13 the Secretary of State is given power to make assumptions about local authority budgets when he considers that information has not been provided by those authorities. Local government rates and taxes, and therefore their budgets, are specifically excluded from the operation of the Parliament Act.

The Bill was introduced retrospectively to overturn decisions by the courts and to deal with the possibility of other court actions. It was also introduced to establish certain numerals and multipliers and to change the nature of the information that the Secretary of State must give to the House.

I submit that the Bill cannot be certified as a money Bill. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider my submission that the House, and in particular members of the Committee, are put in a major difficulty because no advance information was given that there was even a remote possibility of the Bill being certifed as a money Bill.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, the practice of my predecessors invariably has been to leave any certification of a money Bill until after the Bill has been given a Third Reading. If the House gives the Bill a Third Reading today, I shall decide the question of certification tomorrow. I shall, of course, carefully take into account the points raised by the hon. Member.

BILLS PRESENTED

SHOPS (NO. 3)

Sir Fergus Montgomery, supported by Sir Marcus Fox, Mr. Michael Brown, Mr. James Couchman, Mr. Nicholas Lyell, Mr. Jerry Hayes, Mr. Fred Silvester, Sir Reginald Eyre, Mr. Christopher Hawkins, Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Clement Freud and Mr. Gerald Howarth, presented a Bill to relax the restrictions which apply to Sunday trading; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on 24 October and to be printed. [Bill 215.]

REPRESENTATION OF THE WORKPEOPLE

Mr. Tony Benn presented a Bill to provide for the election of the Boards of Directors on certain public limited companies by the workpeople employed in those companies; to make provision regarding the powers of those boards; and for connected purposes. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 214.]

[15TH ALLOTTED DAY] [2ND PART]

Fight Against Crime

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) to move the Opposition motion, I should announce that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.32 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I beg to move,

That this House, in the light of the collapse of the Government's policies on law and order, calls for the implementation of a national crime prevention programme, including crime prevention grants for owner occupiers and tenants and a safe estates programme, in order to ease the pressure on policing work and so increase levels of detection and therefore deter criminals; and further calls for properly funded Government support for a nationwide system of victim support schemes.

A black cloud of lawlessness hangs over Britain today. From Caithness to Cornwall, from Ceredigion to Kent, the country is suffering from the worst crime wave ever known. Last year 4,073,853 serious offences were reported in Great Britain. That was a 41 per cent. increase on 1978 the last full year before the present Prime Minister came to office.

In Thatcher's Britain theft has risen by 30 per cent., violence against the person has risen by 42 per cent., burglaries are up by 52 per cent. and criminal damage is up by 73 per cent. Thatcher's Britain is a Britain in which one crime of violence is committed every four minutes, in which one act of criminal damage is committed ever 51 seconds, in which one burglary is committed ever 32 seconds, in which one case of theft or of handling stolen goods is committed every 15 seconds and in which one serious crime is committed every 8 seconds.

In Thatcher's Britain every family has a 30 per cent. chance of being victims of a serious crime. The crime rate is not only high, but is getting higher. When the Government came to office, 330 serious crimes were being committed every hour. Now, in Thatcher's Britain, not 330 but 465 serious crimes are being committed every hour.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No. The Government took nearly an hour of our time with their disgraceful statement, and I cannot give way at this point in my speech.

In Thatcher's Britain the number of crimes of violence committed each day has gone up from 258 to 366. In Thatcher's Britain the number of acts of criminal damage has gone up from 979 a day to 1,695. In Thatcher's Britain the number of burglaries has gone up from 1,752 a day to 2,662. In Thatcher's Britain the number of thefts has gone up from 4,406 a day to 5,728. That was the grim position up to December 1985.

For England and Wales the figures for the first quarter of this year show yet another sharp rise, with total crime up 7 per cent., violence against the person up 5 per cent., theft up 5 per cent., burglary up 8 per cent., and criminal damage up 14 per cent.

[Mr. Kaufman]

Crime is not only costly to victims in terms of damage and injury, but it is a terrible financial drain on the nation. It is an enormous cost to the police, who spend an average of £2,350 on clearing up each crime that is solved. It is a cost to the courts, to the probation and after-care services, to the legal aid service, to the prison system and to the criminal injuries compensation system. The sums involved in the current year total £4,500 million—a 43 per cent. increase in real terms since this Government came to office.

There are also costs to the economy and to individuals of losses due to crime and to precautions against crime. Insurance payments to crime amounted to £320 million in 1984, and £40 million was spent on alarm systems. The Home Office estimates that in 1984 the total value of property stolen in offences of theft, burglary and robbery was over £1 billion. The cost of fraud is estimated at £3 billion. Much of that fraud is against the Inland Revenue —a highly appropriate crime against the Government, as it is the ultimate act of privatisation. All told it is probable that crime costs our country £10 billion every year. Year by year that cost is growing.

Those are the material costs, but we must add to those the costs to the security and tranquillity of our society. In addition to the facts of crime, there is the fear of crime. Every survey shows the extent of the fear of crime, even among people who may never become victims of crime. The recent Merseyside survey shows that 39 per cent. of respondents worry a lot about crime, 27 per cent. worry about being burgled, and 24 per cent. worry about vandalism. A total of 57 per cent. of women worry about going out on their own after dark. That is almost the same as the proportion of women in Islington who avoid going out after dark for fear of sexual attack or street robbery.

The Home Office study on the fear of crime published in 1984 showed that 52 per cent. of inner city dwellers seriously worry about becoming victims of crime. It showed that 41 per cent. of women in the inner cities feel very unsafe walking alone at night in their neighbourhoods. It showed that 12 per cent. of all inner city residents never go out at night because of crime. The "British Crime Survey", published by the Home Office last year, showed that 40 per cent. of women under 30 were worried about becoming rape victims. Half the women questioned said that they avoided going out unaccompanied after dark. In high crime areas, 18 per cent. of the elderly said that they never went out after dark, wholly or in part because of fear of crime.

Crime and the fear of crime destroy human rights. Every crime means individual suffering and a loss to the whole community. Every crime takes something away from its individual victims—their freedom, their peace of mind, their property, their health or even their lives. Crime of any sort also takes something away from society as a whole. We all lose when someone smashes a public telephone, burns or defaces a building or defrauds the Revenue. However, the fear of crime also diminishes both individuals and society. Parents grow fearful of letting their children out of their sight. The fear of crime changes people's habits and diminishes their freedom of movement and activity. As a Home Office researcher puts it, crime has "the disabling consequence of restricting access to the social and cultural opportunities of society."

In this predicament, people rightly look to the police for safety and protection. The police do their very best, but far too often they know that that very best is nowhere near good enough. Clear-up rates for many crimes are low, and they are falling. Since the Government came into office the overall crime clear-up rate in England and Wales has fallen from 42 to 35 per cent.; the clear-up rate for theft has fallen from 40 to 35 per cent.; for burglaries from 32 to 29 per cent.; and for criminal damage from 30 to 23 per cent. Nearly three burglars in every four get clean away with the loot, while almost four vandals in every five evade detection and punishment.

There are more police, but the burden on them is greater than ever before. Under this Government the number of crimes committed per police officer has risen from 24 to 29 a year. If the Government reacted to the statistical success rate of the police in the same way as they treated the coal and shipbuilding industries, by now the Prime Minister would have put Sir Ian MacGregor in charge of closing down police stations throughout the country. That reaction to the police would be as unfair and as illogical as it was to other industries and services.

Much of the burden that hinders the police has been imposed by the Government or is the result of Government policy. Public order duties are increasingly distracting police from the priority job of fighting crime. That was made clear by the Comptroller and Auditor General in his report this year on the Metropolitan police. He said:

"There were . . . occasions when external demands (for example, for public order duties elsewhere) left insufficient numbers to maintain essential services."

The demands of training for the Police and Criminal Evidence Act and other onerous Government legislation are reducing the operational effectiveness of the police. In his report in 1985 the chief constable of Staffordshire said that training commitments for the Act has so far resulted "in the loss of over 2,000 man weeks of operational availability."

He complained:

"It is often difficult to find the time for training in new legislation without either having to curtail operational availability or cancelling other, equally important, forms of training."

At the Police Federation conference two months ago Mr. Tony Crowe, the chairman of the sergeants section, said that the Act had "taken supervising ranks off the street, leaving inexperienced constables to fend for themselves."

He said that reduction in the first line of supervision would bring a generation of constables who had never had the necessary advice and guidance to develop skills.

A report in The London Standard of 10 July quoted police in Brixton as saying:

"Some detective work is now being done by telephone and residents are going to have to realise the choice we have. Do we take men away from a murder inquiry to investigate something like a stolen car radio? That's what staff shortages mean to us."

A parliamentary answer to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) last week gave the disturbing news that since this Government came to office the number of police in London and the City engaged in the investigation of company fraud has actually been reduced, at a time when fraud is soaring and is more dangerous a crime than it has ever been.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield) rose——

Mr. Kaufman: I do not have time to give way. The Government took up an enormous amount of time with a disgraceful statement about social security. That has taken time away from the Opposition debate.

In the face of this alarming story of record crime rates, reduced clear-up rates and reduced police efficiency, what we get from this Government is a combination of shrill slogans and ineffable complacency. In their 1979 manifesto, the Conservatives proclaimed:

"Surer detection means surer deterrence."

Detection is less sure now than it was seven years ago. In their 1983 manifesto the Government said vainglorioously:

"already street crime is being reduced and public confidence improved in some of the worst inner-city areas."

Yet in those inner-city areas crime under this Government has risen by two thirds — half as much again as the depressing national average.

The Home Secretary said in a press release last March that the number of burglaries had fallen by 4 per cent. the previous year, which suggested that the crime prevention campaign might be beginning to bear fruit. He spoke too soon, because in the quarter that ended with the very month during which he made that boast burglaries rose by 8 per cent.

In this House two months ago the Home Secretary said:

"Local authorities can use the housing investment resources available to them for crime prevention and security measures."—[Official Report, 8 May 1986; Vol. 97, c. 281.]

The right hon. Gentleman seems to be completely unaware that under this Government those housing investment resources have been slashed by 70 per cent. Local authorities do not even have the cash to carry out their most basic housing responsibilities, let alone expand the necessary work of crime prevention.

On 13 March the Prime Minister said, in her most characteristic let-them-eat-cake frame of mind:

"Most people will and should be able to make their own provision for crime prevention." — [Official Report, 13 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 1079.]

We know that that is exactly what the right hon. Lady is preparing to do for herself in her retreat to Fort Dulwich, but surveys such as that in Islington show that income is a major factor in determining whether security devices are installed and that many people who would like to take crime prevention measures cannot afford to do so. It is time for a nationally led and co-ordinated crime prevention campaign. It is clear from their ludicrous amendment to the Labour party motion that no such lead can be expected from this Government.

Already the Government's efforts to show what they are doing about crime prevention have taken on an air of pathos. Earlier this month the Home Secretary planted a question with the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) that had so little positive to claim about Government action on crime prevention that his answer was reduced to boasting about raising the profile of crime prevention and urging various organisations to identify crime prevention potential. Two seminars have been held at Downing street amid the kind of fanfares that Mr. Bernard Ingham usually reserves for vilifying a Cabinet Minister out of favour. Nothing positive has come from either seminar.

The Government's amendment goes through the usual motions of proclaiming

"additional resources . . . devoted to law and order".

In fact, expenditure on policing during the current financial year in real terms is due to fall slightly. The report on spending on law and order produced a few months ago by the partly Government funded National Institute of Economic and Social Research states:

"there is little ostensible association between police resources and recorded clear up rates."

The outcome of all the spending has been a 4 per cent. increase in serious crime

Cuts and spending ceilings imposed by the Government on local authorities — for example, £20,000 million less in rate support grant — mean fewer caretakers, park-keepers and attendants who look after public places and the people who use them. The loss of these public employees means more graffiti, vandalism and petty crime. It means also that public places stay vandalised or derelict for longer periods. That in turn reduces the character of the environment and stimulates further crime.

That is why the Labour Government will launch an immediate programme aimed at preventing crime and making neighbourhoods safer. We want to help city, town and rural areas, tenants and owner-occupiers. Some council estates have suffered especially high crime rates. The fear of crime is both deep and wide, especially in inner city estates, and it causes people to be trapped into their homes from dusk till dawn. They are fearful even of opening their doors to callers.

Many estates face intense problems because of bad design, inadequate maintenance, cuts in caretaking and other staff, insensitive and remote bureaucracy, inadequate provision for children and families, inadequate privacy and insulation, no opportunity for people to meet in safety and insufficient protection for ethnic minorities and other victims of harassment. All these problems can be reduced with the right approach from national Government and local government and from the community as a whole. The Labour party's policy towards crime prevention on local authority housing estates acknowledges that improving security and public safety and reducing crime are linked crucially to increased investment in public sector housing.

Labour will act to make tenants safer and more secure. We need more resident caretakers, tower-block receptionists and other estate staff who are properly trained, supervised and supported, in conjunction with physical security measures, a responsive repairs service, a sensitive allocation policy and effective neighbourhood policing. Such measures will be planned in accordance with the wishes of the local community. As we say in our motion, Labour will establish "a safe estates programme". With the increased allocations for housing expenditure that Labour will make available, local authorities will be encouraged to place more caretakers, including resident caretakers, and to strengthen front entrance doors, frames, locks and windows.

Mr. Tim Smith: How much will it all cost?

Mr. Kaufman: Much less than the £10 billion that the economy loses as a result of crime.

We shall improve lighting on streets, stairwells, corridors, balconies and walkways. We shall replace breakable fittings and materials with those that cannot be broken. We shall install entryphone systems and closed circuit television surveillance in medium and high-rise blocks. We shall adopt design changes to reduce crime and the fear of it——

Mr. Tim Smith: Unbreakable windows?

Mr. Kaufman: I bet that the Prime Minister has unbreakable windows at Dulwich.

We shall adopt design changes to reduce crime and the fear of it by reducing the number of escape routes for criminals, by removing connecting walkways and by partitioning large blocks. We shall establish carefully located and supervised play areas and introduce regular patrolling on foot by caretakers and other council employees. We shall establish more support for established tenants' and residents' associations.

The Labour Government will take measures also to prevent crime in private housing and in public places. We shall legislate in our first Session to make available crime prevention grants on application by both home owners and tenants. These grants will be available within the rateable value limits that apply to improvement grants and repair grants. Their cost will be contained within the increased housing investment allocations that will be provided to local authorities as part of the Labour Government's drive against bad housing and unemployment. Such grants will be extremely cost-effective. The average cost of clearing up a crime is nearly 50 times more than the cost of basic home security provision. Let it be known throughout the country that tonight Tory Members will be voting against a national system of crime prevention grants.

The Labour Government will ensure that local authorities involve residents in the planning of security and safety measures in homes and in the surrounding streets or courtyards. We shall encourage the provision of safer public transport. We believe that security should be improved by providing alarm buttons and closed-circuit TV at bus and train stations and by closing off little-used passageways, especially on Underground systems. We shall — [Interruption.] I am interested to note that Conservative Members should heckle so much. I am putting forward practical plans to deal with crime, and all we get from Conservative Members and the Government is waffle, seminars and slogans. There is no action and we have the worst crime rate that Britain has ever known.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: The needs of security and the fears of passengers on public transport—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I shall not give way to the pathetic hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), who merely rises to toady to the Government on every possible opportunity.

The needs of security and the fears of passengers——

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) to refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) as a pathetic Member?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): There is nothing unparliamentary about that.

Mr. Kaufman: There can never be anything unparliamentary about the truth, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The needs of security and the fears of passengers on public transport should be taken into account in planning bus routes, bus stop location and crewing. We shall take measures to reduce the high level of car crime. We shall have discussions with manufacturers to produce design changes——

Mr. Wheeler: That is being done now.

Mr. Kaufman: But nothing is happening, even after seven years.

Mr. Wheeler: It will happen.

Mr. Kaufman: These design changes will be related, for example, to steering column locks and electronic locking and alarms.

Mr. Wheeler: That was done in 1979.

Mr. Kaufman: Are Conservative Members saying that the measures that I am suggesting have been in operation for seven years, bearing in mind the 41 per cent. increase in crime and the highest level of auto crime ever known?

The Government and Conservative Members generally now make many claims and all sorts of promises. They have had seven years in which to keep their promises and yet they have broken every one. Let it be clearly understood that when Conservative Members vote this evening they will be voting against the Labour party's safe estates and crime prevention campaigns.

Even with much more co-ordinated community action in defence of law and order, the Labour Government will still inherit a high level of crime. Many crimes mean many victims and it is time for much more positive action to be taken to support victims at their time of loss and injury. The Government have the impertinence in their amendment to claim credit for the development of victim support schemes, but the victim support movement tells a different story. Government support for the movement amounts to precisely to £286,000.

Mr. Tim Smith: That is more than the Labour Government provided.

Mr. Kaufman: That sum is small enough in itself and it is not even available in the long-term.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): How much did the Labour Government provide?

Mr. Kaufman: In his report, which was issued the week before last, the chairman of the National Association of Victims Support Schemes expressed concern that no Government allocation had been made to extend beyond 1987. He contrasted what he described as the Home Secretary's "fine words" with the absence of secure funding. He said:

"the last twelve months have been marked by a growing anger at the mis-match between official statements of support for victim support schemes and the level of financial assistance provided."

He warned against the Government abdicating their responsibility towards victims.

The association's annual report starkly stated:

"The precarious position of schemes' finances unquestionably limits their scope to develop a full service to the victims of crimes. Not only the shortage of funds, but also their lack of continuity, continue serving as grievous constraints on the work of many schemes."

The Association of Chief Police Officers made the accusation that the effectiveness of victims support schemes is "constrained through inadequate and haphazard funding".

Set against those facts, today's Government amendment is the rankest hypocrisy. A Labour Government will act to ensure that victims support schemes are available throughout the country. Many parts of Britain entirely lack such schemes, yet the work carried out by those schemes, to counsel, comfort and help crime victims, including abused children, battered wives and rape victims, is beyond price. We will discuss with the National Association of Victims Support Schemes what sums of money it needs to provide the services that it regards as essential. When we have costed them carefully, we will provide the money that is needed. Victim support on a much larger and wider scale calls for sums that are tiny within the national budget. We will enable that support to be provided. When Tory Members vote this evening, they will be voting against positive Government assistance for victim support.

Crime is a disease in our society. Every disease has its causes. The Government fail to address those causes. In fact, they are responsible for some of them. The National Institute of Economic and Social Research gives details of the links between social deprivation and crime. It points out that those authorities that have the highest recorded crime rates include those most densely populated, those with the worst overcrowding and those with high rates of unemployment.

The position was put even more bluntly in the annual report of the chief constable of Greater Manchester, which was published last week. In that report, Mr. James Anderton dealt directly with Greater Manchester, but it applies to the country as a whole. He said:

"Burdens on police in Greater Manchester have grown against a background of alarming unemployment generally averaging 15 per cent. for all age groups throughout the area, but with a much larger problem in the inner-city. Perhaps of more telling significance, from the standpoint of law and public order, is the fact that the figure for long-term unemployment among the crime-prone younger age groups in the worst affected parts of the conurbation, not just in the inner-city, ranges from 50 per cent. to a staggering 80 per cent. or more. Policing certainly has to be wise, caring and sensible in those distinctive localities where almost the entire population is out of work and living on 'social security.'"

High levels of crime tell us not only about the kinds of criminals at large in our society, but about the kind of society that creates the conditions that nurture such criminals. When confrontation is deliberately incited, when bitterness is provoked and envy is stirred up, when more and more people are frustrated, living without hope, and made to feel that society has rejected them, crimes of every kind are more likely to be committed.

Under this Government, Britain has become a family divided against itself. Division is deliberately stirred up between old and young, the retired and those still at work, employed and unemployed, north and south, black and white, inner city and suburbs. No family can prosper when some of its members feel neglected and despised. To have any hope of success, the fight against crime needs a new start. For that new start, we need a new Government.

5.4 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof,

'reaffirms its support for the Government's commitment to pursuing an honest, vigorous and coherent policy in the fight against crime; welcomes the additional resources the Government has devoted to law and order, the success of Government backed crime prevention initiatives such as Neighbourhood Watch and property marking schemes, the encouragement given to local crime prevention initiatives, and the development of victim support schemes; expresses support for the police in their efforts to build closer links with the community; and believes everybody has a responsibility to participate in the fight against crime.'.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) seems to believe that by repeating statistics he can make them less misleading. He repeated statistics that he has cited in the House. They are designed to show that the "black cloud", as he called it, settled over Britain — what he called "Thatcher's Britain" — in the years following 1979. If we are to have a serious discussion, I hope that we can start from the fact that recorded crime has risen steadily — between 5 and 7 per cent. — over the past 30 years.

One can toss about statistics. I could, if I wished to do so, show the right hon. Gentleman that violent crime, which is what concerns most people most of the time, rose substantially faster in what I suppose I must call Wilson's and Callaghan's Britain. Since 1979, that type of crime has slowed down in its rate of increase. Although the right hon. Gentleman spent at least 10 minutes tossing about such statistics, I do not think that it is sensible to do so. I am prepared to agree that the nation faces a major problem that has been mounting over 30 years, and that it requires a major and a national effort to deal with it.

The right hon. Gentleman's party has no credentials or credibility to allow it to join in such an effort. We heard nothing today from the right hon. Gentleman about attacks on the police and on most things that they do which have characterised past debates on the subject, especially the recent debate on policing in London. The right hon. Gentleman made an unfair and an inexact comment or two, especially about police training under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. When there is a major piece of new legislation, there must be a major and a once and for all development of police training. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen would be the first to complain if the police were not adequately trained in the law of the land, especially in the safeguards for the citizen which the Act introduced.

Those safeguards were long debated by the right hon. Gentleman and me in Committee and on the Floor of the House. They are extensive and, in some respects, complicated. They would have been much more extensive and complicated if we had accepted the Opposition's amendments. During those debates we tried to keep the scheme and the safeguards as simple as we could, bearing in mind the burden on the police that would inevitably result.

Mr. Wheeler rose—

Mr. Hurd: I shall give way to my hon. Friend because he was grossly maltreated by the right hon. Member for Gorton.

Mr. Wheeler: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, when he and I spent 59 sittings on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, the Opposition pressed strongly for safeguards concerning liberty and the treatment of individuals, and that my right hon. Friend saw the wisdom of many of them? Does my right hon. Friend not find it curious that the Opposition should now criticise an Act that they played a part in developing for the obligations that it imposes on the police service?

Mr. Hurd: I agree. The right hon. Gentleman and Opposition Members generally thrive on a short memory, because if people had long memories, Labour's arguments would rapidly collapse.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned public order duties. I am worried about the way in which the argument is developing. I do not understand the Labour party's position on public order. It seems to boil down to saying that some people deserve protection and others do not, and that, for example, the electricians and others who choose to work at Wapping should be left out of account. I do not know whether the argument is that there should be no policing at Wapping, so that it is impossible for people to exercise their right to work, or whether there should be only enough police to ensure that they are outdone and outnumbered by the pickets. The right hon. Gentleman did not develop that argument. It is an absolutely crucial argument if we are to get the balance right.

The question of the balance in the use of resources inside any police force, including the Metropolitan police, must be left to the chief officer of police. I am deeply concerned that the Labour party's proposals would lead to the politicisation of police forces and political decisions as to who should be protected by the law and the police and who should not. No doubt, there will be occasions on which Labour Members can develop their points.

The subject of the Opposition's motion is crime prevention and victim support, and I welcome that. Strenuous efforts in crime prevention were begun by my predecessor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). Of course, that work had been going on before but he placed new emphasis on it and put new resources into it. Since then, we have always been missionaries in this respect. If the right hon. Member for Gorton and his colleagues are to join in the efforts and activities that are afoot throughout the country, they are welcome. The fact that they have lagged a little behind in the past makes their joining no less welcome now.

Of course, there is a difference in approach, which is illustrated by the Opposition's motion and the Government's amendment. The main difference between us is not on the need for crime prevention but on the attitudes to public spending in relation to it. I could not understand the point made by the right hon. Member for Gorton. Presumably, he was at the gathering at the weekend at Bishop's Stortford and knows what the instructions are. They are clear—that Labour will tax the very rich, which means those on £27,000 a year, which will yield £3·6 billion. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has told us that that money will be used for just four provisions—pensions, child benefit, long-term unemployment pay and tax allowances for low-paid couples, and nothing else. Opposition spokesmen are enjoined not to promise anything else during the first two years in government. That is the distinction—famous in the Labour party—between the pledge and the lightly given promise. We have pledges, which fall within the £3·6 billion, and lightly given promises, which are the rest of the £24 billion so far promised. The schemes of the right hon. Member for Gorton, including those announced today, clearly fall into the category of the lightly given promises. They will not be undertaken in those two years, although the right hon. Gentleman said something very different today. I do not understand therefore how, after what we have heard about the Labour party's priorities, the right hon. Gentleman can pretend that he is giving priority to crime prevention or to victim support.

Once again, by pretending to give priority to everything, the Opposition are clearly showing that they give priority to nothing and that they have not thought matters through. One must therefore turn to the past to see where their real priorities are likely to lie in the future. When one considers the disgraceful state in which my predecessors in 1979 found the prisons and the police, it seems unlikely that the type of activities that the right hon. Member for Gorton now praises will find any decent priority in a Labour Government's programme.

I should like to consider what is being done. I hope that the House will forgive me if I dwell on this, but the main thesis of the right hon. Member for Gorton was that we were doing nothing, except making a few speeches and sermons. I should like to start with the work of the police in crime prevention. I am anxious that this work should be stressed because I am concerned that, in recent weeks, much publicity has been attached to the police and their equipment for use in the last resort if there was a breakdown in public order. It is high time that a little more attention was paid to what the police are doing day by day to prevent crime.

Police work with young people in schools is obviously crucial in view of the peak age of offending — 15 for boys and 14 for girls. Undoubtedly, it is an advantage to have 43 different local police forces, almost all of which are experimenting and innovating. The Staffordshire scheme for young people — SPACE — occupies some 23,000 secondary school pupils for the whole of August each year in more than 2,500 different activities. The signs are that it has contributed to a decrease in offending by youngsters. The West Midlands police have initiated an ambitious project in the Ladywood and Handsworth district of Birmingham — the Ladworth project — in which local agencies work together with community groups to provide recreation and employment opportunities for young people in the inner city.

The Lancashire police run a scheme in the Lake District, which is fully used most weekends of the year in youth activities. The Cumbria and Northamptonshire police forces run more specifically work-orientated schemes to give young people some work experience with the police. The Leicestershire police, whom I recently visited, hope to mount an even more ambitious scheme in the Highfields area of Leicester to give selected youngsters a chance to try a variety of jobs in co-operation with local police.

Those are all police schemes which show how foolish it is to argue that the police neglect this aspect and are interested only in equipment and new powers.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that I have written to him about forensic science problems and the advantage of developing forensic science, especially under Brian Caddy of the university of Strathclyde? Is there not a case for having a forensic department to which defence counsel can turn for second opinions, in view of all the difficulties of the Birmingham six?

Mr. Hurd: Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister of State could deal with that point in detail. Although it is a serious suggestion, it does not flow immediately from the points I was developing. As regards the Birmingham six, the hon. Gentleman, who takes a serious interest in this matter, knows that I am deliberately taking time to examine whether there is fresh evidence in Mr. Mullins' book.

I shall move now to the activity of other Government agencies involved in the subject which the Opposition chose for their motion and about which the right hon. Member for Gorton said that nothing was being done. We have a programme of measures designed to improve the security of owner — occupiers and tenants. Some of those measures are financial. The Department of the Environment has set aside £50 million of housing capital resources in this financial year for allocation by the urban housing renewal unit to run-down local authority estates. In the 33 cases approved to date, one third of the resources has been spent on crime prevention measures — exactly the sort of point about which the Opposition talk.

The right hon. Member for Gorton may not know about the priority estates programme of the Department of the Environment but it is relevant to his points. That programme is working on measures which help to reduce crime, with special emphasis on the participation of residents — another point made by the right hon. Gentleman. Many of the projects funded through the urban programme contribute to crime prevention. Last year, some £6 million was spent on projects directly concerned with crime. Community programmes involve a substantial commitment of resources to crime prevention projects on housing estates.

Under the national initiative, announced earlier this year, more than 5,000 community programme cases have been approved for crime prevention work. These resources represent a substantial Government investment in safer estates. We are also considering ways of improving the design of estates to deter crime. The Department of the Environment is commissioning consultants to prepare a handbook on improving dwellings and the environmental features of local authority estates with special attention being paid to security and crime prevention. I do not rule out the possibility of developing further action along those lines.

I turn to one aspect which I do not think the right hon. Member for Gorton mentioned but which is crucial in effective crime prevention — the neighbourhood watch scheme. There are now 14,500 schemes in England and Wales — an increase of more than 75 per cent. over the past six months. Properly designed neighbourhood watch schemes can reduce local crime, improve relations between police and the community, reduce the fear of crime — about which the right hon. Member for Gorton is quite right — and provide a new impetus for neighbours to meet and work together.

I suppose, following on from the analysis of the right hon. Member for Gorton, that the right hon. Gentleman is in favour of all that. But what is happening, for example, in Manchester under the new leadership of the city council? Far from forging the type of efforts about which the right hon. Member for Gorton made a speech, it is deliberately holding them back. It is making it more difficult for residents to come together with the police to make their streets "safer and more secure", to quote the right hon. Gentleman's objective.

The right hon. Member for Gorton says that more money should be given to local authorities for this purpose. If more money were given to Manchester city council, what would it spend it on? I bet that it would spend the money on producing even glossier and more vicious editions of its disgraceful publication "Police Watch". I say that plucking just one example from the several others that could be used, and there are others in London. If the Labour party is to be taken seriously in the attitude that it has expressed today, it will have to do something to restrain and reverse the policies of those Labour authorities — fortunately, a minority — which are taking exactly the opposite line to that taken by the Labour Front Bench.

We intend to maintain and boost the momentum behind the neighbourhood watch schemes and we shall be launching a new national magazine in co-operation with the private sector. [HON. MEMBERS: "Will it be a glossy one?"] The difference between what we propose and the behaviour of Manchester city council is that we are helping communities to work with the police to protect their property, whereas Manchester city council is undermining those efforts.

To continue with the list of actions that we are taking, no doubt the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends have told him of the five local schemes that the Home Office is now operating in Swansea, Wellingborough, Croydon, Tyneside and Bolton. A two-week autocrime campaign in Wellingborough concentrating on the major car parks produced a 10 per cent. reduction in thefts of cars in May compared with the same period last year and compared with a 5½ per cent. increase for the Wellingborough subdivision as a whole. Autocrime in the car parks targeted was halved. That is just one small practical example of what is being done through our crime prevention programmes.

The two seminars, which the right hon. Gentleman lightly mocked but which I am glad to say were fully supported by the trade union movement, have produced a whole series of new ventures for preventing crime in both the public sector and the private sector. I hope that we shall be making further announcements about actual decisions in the coming months, but they cover insurance, increased protection against residential burglary and increased security in the design of cars.

The right hon. Gentleman was quite correct to stress that victim support is crucial and that for too long victims have been the forgotten parties in the criminal justice system. The Government have accepted the need to provide the movement with some support from public funds and we have trebled the grant to the National Association of Victims Support Schemes in the past two years, enabling it to increase its staff, to move to larger premises and substantially to expand its work. Contrary to the impression given by the right hon. Gentleman, a survey of 200 local schemes in 1985-86 showed that half were receiving grants from central Government totalling £750,000. This was by far the main source of funds for local schemes, the same 200 receiving £250,000 from local authorities and only £88,000 from private sources such as trusts and charities and their own fund-raising initiatives. There is great scope for expanding and further varying the sources of income for victim support schemes. Nevertheless, this year we are for the first time providing some direct funding for local schemes. We have provided £136,000 to establish a contingency fund administered by the national association to help hard-pressed schemes and 68 schemes have already received grants from that source, which, according to the national association, will serve as a lifeline for many schemes.

[Mr. Hurd]

The first schemes of this kind were established in Bristol in 1974. There were 30 local schemes when we came to office. There are now 300. In 1985-86, nearly 4,000 trained volunteers dealt with 185,000 victims, mostly referred to them by the police — a sixfold increase. I thoroughly agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we should put emphasis on this aspect and we are doing so in this and several other ways. As a further development, we propose to introduce provisions next Session requiring the courts either to make a compensation order when sentencing an offender or to give specific reasons for not doing so, thus shifting the onus and putting a responsibility on the court to make an order or to explain why it is not doing so. We are preparing comprehensive guidelines to help the courts to assess realistic amounts of compensation in personal injury cases.

I hope that I have said enough to show that in the two areas singled out by the Opposition — crime prevention and victim support — major efforts are already in progress, employing not just the resources of the Home Office but the efforts of police, local authorities and a wide range of Government agencies. This should be a national effort and if today's debate, despite the right hon. Gentleman's perverse speech, means that the Opposition now intend to be constructive and put behind them the kind of activity of which I complained in relation to Manchester city council, I welcome them aboard.

In our last debate on these matters I had a rather odd experience. I was chided by the right hon. Gentleman for uttering homilies, but later in his speech he started talking about the need for partnership. For a moment I genuinely thought that he was quoting a speech of mine that I had forgotten so as to mock me further, but he then sat down — having used exactly the type of formulation about partnership that I had used. The Labour party has a long way to go before its credentials in this area are established, but if the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends wish to join in a national effort, despite the perversity of their specific proposals, I believe that that will be helpful.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his written answer to my question about the neighbourhood watch scheme in Southampton. I am especially sad that only one of the city's 15 wards has such a scheme and that only four members of the police are currently organising such schemes. Does my right hon. Friend think that there could be a little more publicity and television time devoted to the scheme, as I understand that there is a great deal of literature at the police stations just waiting for people to come forward?

Mr. Hurd: I shall certainly look at the position in Southampton. I think that many cities, having watched the rapid growth of the schemes elsewhere, will now be looking to their laurels to ensure that they compete. The material is certainly readily available from the Home Office. My hon. Friend the Minister of State may be able to say a little more about Southampton when he winds up, following that useful intervention which illustrates the impetus behind the whole effort. I hope that today's debate will add to that impetus.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to a black cloud of lawlessness hanging over the country. The assumption is that crime stems from unemployment, the fragmentation of the family, the glorification of violence on television and, in my view, the example set by the state. I wish to draw attention to one example of that.

On 7 June on the George Negus interview programme on Radio 2UE in Sydney and Radio 3AK in Melbourne, Australia, Mr. Richard Victor Hall made a number of statements about a book by Mr. Peter Wright, a former employee of M15, referring to lawlessness and law breaking in Britain. According to the Australian media, Mr. Peter Wright claimed that M15 had attempted to bug the French and West German embassies in London, placed microphones behind the cipher machines in the Greek and Indonesian embassies, bugged diplomatic conferences at Lancaster house in the 1950s and 1960s and the Zimbabwe independence negotiations in 1979. Mr. Wright alleges that M15 entered Russian consulates abroad, plotted against Mr. Harold Wilson during his 1974-76 premiership and diverted resources to investigate Left-wing groups in Britain instead of setting its own house in order. He is also believed to have details of a plot to assassinate President Nasser during the Suez crisis and details of meetings between officials from American intelligence agencies, the National Security Agency, the CIA, the FBI, GCHQ and M15. He alleges that M15 was involved in the testing of poison on sheep and in switching number plates on vehicles in this country. He also alleges Nikita Khrushchev's suite at Claridges was bugged during his visit in the 1950s and refers to the opening of diplomatic bags by M15 and other forms of law breaking in Britain.

Mr. Wright, who left M15 in 1976 and lives in Tasmania, cannot be prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act. Instead, our Government are seeking an injunction to prevent Heinemann's Australian subsidiary from publishing his memoirs by bringing a civil suit for breach of confidence. Sir Robert Armstrong, the Cabinet Secretary, has argued in an affidavit that publication would lose confidence in M15's ability to protect classified information. The Government have refused to tell Mr. Wright's lawyers which extract of the memoirs he has written they believe should remain confidential.

That is law breaking in Britain, and we now see our Government involved in a cover up. The proposition in the Government's amendment, which stands in the Prime Minister's name, is rubbish. The Prime Minister does not believe in containing law and order or in reasonable policies on law and order. She believes that it is right for the state to break the law, and that is why the Attorney-General is using the courts in the way that he is at present. He is hiding the breaking of the law by British civil servants.

Mr. Julian Critchley (Aldershot): We are witnessing a splendid irony. At the same moment as the Shadow Home Secretary discovers crime, the chairman of the Conservative party stumbles across sin. We shall not be short of sermons!

The relish which the Labour party has brought to the problems of crime — the legacy of the Thatcher years, and so on — is matched only by the relish with which the chairman of the Conservative party upbraids the British people and attacks the "permissive society". It appears that when it comes to crime, it is everyone's fault but our own.

Faced with the question that from time to time our constituents still put to us—"Why can politicians do nothing about crime?"—we politicians are, for a moment at least, lost for words. The Labour party and the Prince of Wales together are inclined to blame the figures for rising crime on rising unemployment, especially among young people. Who am I to quarrel with the Prince of Wales? There is a good deal in that argument. On the other hand, the chairman of the Conservative party goes into the pulpit and blames the so-called permissive society. Working on the assumption that the Conservative party needs all the friends that it can get, he is enlisting the so-called moral majority—salvationists who are no longer interested in the next world, only in this one. May God preserve us from them!

We all know only too well how the argument runs. The moralists say that rising crime is due to kids staying up late at night and watching the telly; to the BBC for showing so much sex and violence; to easier divorce; to married women going out to work; to the fact that homosexual behaviour between adults is no longer a criminal offence; to the fact that a play in the West End is no longer censored; and to the fact that robbers are no longer flogged and murderers no longer swing.

That is nonsense, or worse. It is worse because, as far as I know, the Conservative party is not committed to doing anything about it. Conservatives are not pledged in any manifesto to reverse any of the social legislation that has been passed by this House over the last 15 to 20 years—in which case it is hypocritical as well. However, it is well known that humbug is the essential lubricant of life—certainly of our life in this place.

There is in fact an answer to the question that our constituents are for ever asking—"What can the politicians do about rising crime?". It is quite simple. We should increase the price of drink. I beg of hon. Members to stay with me. I have no wish to lose all my friends. Let me explain. In 1946, notifiable offences against the person in England and Wales were 4,062, and the real cost of a bottle of whisky at 1985 prices was £16·30. By 1956, under Sir Anthony Eden, the real cost of a bottle of whisky had fallen to £14·60 and violent crime figures had risen to nearly 8,000. I beg hon. Members to stay with me because the story gets better.

In 1961, in the golden days of Lord Stockton, violent crime rose to 15,000, and by 1965, under Lord Wilson, it went up to nearly 30,000. In 1970, under my right hon. Friend the Member for Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—the old Pretender—the real cost of the hard stuff had fallen to £12·60 and violent crime against the person had risen to 41,000. By 1975, under the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and Lord Wilson, the cost of a bottle of whisky had fallen to £9·15, and violent crime soared to 71,000. By 1980, the first year of the "counter revolution," the cost of a bottle of Scotch had fallen to £7·70 and the figures for violent crime rose to 97,000. In 1985, whisky still cost £7·70 and violent crime rose to a record 119,000 offences.

I have left the Scots until last. If anything, they have been prepared to take an even more handsome advantage of a 60 per cent. fall in the real cost of whisky over the past 40 years—patriots to a man and woman.

I am no statistician. I know the old joke about statistics, drunks and lamp-posts. But there must be a relationship between drink—particularly the hard stuff—and, violent crime. Ask David Lloyd George or, if he cannot be found, John Grigg. Ask the Russians, the Swedes, the Icelanders or the Finns. Ask anyone. If the Government are really concerned to do something about the remorseless rise in crime—this applies equally to the Opposition—why not increase the tax on booze? I appeal to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker: was not sobriety a Victorian virtue?

5.38 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): During the first 55 minutes of the debate I was reminded of one of the favourite stories of my children—how the elephant got his trunk. But in the version to which we listened it was difficult to ascertain who was the elephant and who was the crocodile.

On the one hand, the Home Secretary claimed at least some measure of success in his criminal justice policy and the fight against crime which he said the Government were putting up. However, we heard ample evidence of the failure of that policy, in the waterfall of correct statistics that were produced by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

On the other hand, the right hon. Member for Gorton claimed that the Labour party had the recipe for preventing crime; but that comes from a party whose credibility is perhaps not of the highest in this area. It comes from a party that is apparently prepared to palliate the consequences of criminal conviction for miners who were convicted of criminal offences—some of violence—against individuals. It comes from a party that in some areas is not prepared to allow often the most popular visitor—the uniformed police constable who comes as a crime prevention officer—into primary schools. It comes from a party that is not prepared to give the sort of encouragement to responsible neighbourhood watch schemes—and, of course, they need careful control—that it ought to be giving. It comes from a party that even in the city that includes the constituency of the right hon. Member for Gorton—and I saw a copy of this waved at the right hon. Gentleman at a fringe meeting at the Police Federation conference to which he referred—has been issuing a newsletter to the population which frequently contains clear attacks upon the police.

Both the Government and the Labour party seem to have lost sight of the fundamental priorities of which we should be speaking when we discuss the prevention of crime. I hope that the whole House will agree that the priorities of a successful criminal justice and crime prevention policy within a fair system of legal checks and balances are, first, to ensure that people can live in their homes without the fear of those homes being ravaged and looted by burglars and vandals and, secondly, to ensure that people, whether they be young or old, male or female, black or white, can walk the streets without the fear of their peace being disturbed. As we approach the conclusion of the debate, we should be able to show the public that politicians regard those as the fundamental priorities and that they are looking for solutions which will enable those priorities to succeed.

The Labour party motion is commendable so far as it goes. I particularly congratulate the right hon. Member for Gorton on his reference to victim support schemes. I agreed with him wholeheartedly when he criticised the Government for talking humbug in pretending that they had given proper support to those schemes. But the right hon. Gentleman presented the House with a bizzare form of salesmanship of double glazing. In his society of closed-circuit televisions in every public place, of double-glazed houses so that it is harder to break windows, of smash-proof windows, of more caretakers, of strengthened car locks and more cars with alarms, what will the Labour party do to attack the underlying causes of crime?

It is not good enough and it will not satisfy the public to talk about a policy which tinkers around the superficialities of making homes and cars more secure without addressing the more fundamental realities of the crime problem and thus of crime prevention. The Labour party motion does not refer to that. The proposals made by the Labour party, albeit rather gift-wrapped by the right hon. Gentleman, but even in their unwrapped form, obviously go some way towards easing the burden on police officers, although it is questionable whether the programme can be delivered economically. But those proposals do nothing to improve the quality and nature of the attack which we must make on crime.

It is far more important for us to look at the structure, organisation, and accountability of the police to ascertain whether, through promoting and increasing the efficiency of our police forces, we can tackle the wave of crime of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke. We could swamp the country with police officers, but that would be unacceptable. We must strike a balance between increasing the numbers of police officers on the streets and overpolicing with consequent reduction of the quality of our police forces.

When we compare the sort of proposals made by the Labour party in its motion with what can be done through conventional policing and enhancing the efficiency of police forces, let us not forget the cost-effectiveness of the ordinary bobby. If all a police constable on the beat achieves in one year is to keep one person out of prison for one year, he has paid his salary and is cost-effective. The fight against crime is being lost because we are not making use of our police officers cost effectively and because we do not have sufficient police officers where they are needed. The Home Secretary shakes his head, but he will know that if the Thames Valley police area, which includes his constituency of Witney, were to have sufficient police officers to meet the average policing rate for England and Wales, its manpower would have to be increased by 25 per cent. The Home Secretary knows that fact, and he knows that the chief constable of the Thames Valley police believes that he should be given more officers in order to be able to mount proper squads of detectives and a full effort in the prevention of crime. It is impossible to understand the Home Secretary's reasons for depriving Thames Valley police of the manpower that it needs merely to be an average sized police force in proportion to the population of its enormous area.

The fight against crime is being lost both in the number of crimes and in the seriousness of the crimes committed. I shall not weary the House by repeating the statistics given by the right hon. Member for Gorton. At times some forces claim an improvement in clear-up rates, or at least evidence of improvement. The Home Secretary will be aware that in The Observer of 13 July 1986 certain allegations were made by PC Ronald Walker of the Kent constabulary about the genuineness of those clear-up rates at least for part of Kent. He will be aware that that was not a new complaint but was already under investigation. I hope that he will agree that it is in the public interest, and certainly in the interests of the police, that genuine clear-up rates should always be available. I trust that he will take steps to ensure that guidelines are issued to police forces so that there is some uniformity in the way in which clear-up rates are prepared, and so that the public and the House are not misled into believing that the police are having greater success in clearing up crime than is the case. I refer in particular to the so-called system of write-offs, in which statements are prepared either by or purporting to be by people in prison convicted of crimes, who accept that they committed many other crimes.

In the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister there is yet another claim by the Government which suggests that the Conservative party has some sort of proprietary interest in law and order, and that it is the only party which is remotely capable of delivering law and order. We have already heard the statistics. It is particularly alarming to see a reference in the amendment to "the Government's commitment to pursuing an honest, vigorous and coherent policy in the fight against crime."

Does the Home Secretary believe that the 25 per cent. undermanning in the Thames Valley police is evidence of vigour?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. and learned Gentleman is falling into the increasingly prevalent trick, or trap, of describing as a cut or deprivation an increase which is somewhat smaller than those concerned would like. He will know that among the increases in police forces announced this year are a 73 post increase for Merseyside, a 50 post increase for Thames Valley, a 40 post increase for Norfolk, a 29 post increase for Warwickshire, and an 18 post increase for Devon and Cornwall. Those are the first results of the further increase, on top of the already massive increase, which we propose for the police forces of England and Wales outside London.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving those figures. He has reminded the House that for the Thames Valley police force, including his own constituency, 50 extra officers are being allowed this year; but he knows perfectly well that in order for Thames Valley to have the same ratio of police to population as the average police force in England and Wales, he should have given it not 50 but 750 extra police officers this year. I do not believe that the Home Secretary can satisfactorily deny that figure. It is indeed a deprivation. Thames Valley is entitled to the same rate of policing as any other part of the country. It is a deprivation of which there is evidence in other areas. Manchester was quoted earlier as another example.

Does the Home Secretary suggest that that kind of deprivation is evidence of a commitment to a vigorous policy of crime prevention? Is it really evidence of a coherent policy on crime prevention? Above all, is it honest for the Government to come to the House and say, "We are making all these efforts to prevent crime," but at the same time to hide in the statistics the fact that they are not giving the chief constables, who know how many police officers they need to have just an average sized force, that size of force? That is what is happening in many police forces, including Thames Valley.

The reality is that it does not need the right hon. Member for Gorton, the Home Secretary, me, or any other hon. Member to tell the Government what policing is needed. The good British public will tell the Government what policing is needed. Not even the wisdom of Lord Scarman is required to tell the Government what is needed to improve policing and prevent crime.

If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were to ask the public of this country what they believe is needed to improve crime prevention, they would give you the right answer, and it would be along these lines: that it is as important for a member of the public to know who is his local police officer as it is for him to know the name of his newsagent, doctor, milkman and chemist; that it is absolutely vital that there should be restored to the streets of this country something which many people of a generation older than I remember well — the local police officer from the local whole-time or part-time police station, according to the needs of his area; that it is absolutely necessary, not only in the inner cities but in the smaller towns and villages of this country, to ensure that the people can see their police in action — not whizzing past in panda cars but, wherever possible, policing on foot. That is not happening now.

In their amendment, the Government express support for the police. Of course the Government

"expresses support for the police in their efforts to build closer links with the community".

Nobody could doubt the truth of those words in the Government's amendment. However, they do not give the support that the police need

"in their efforts to build closer links with the community".

The result is that the morale of the public, as they face increasing crime, and the morale of the police, as they do their best to swim against the tide of increasing crime, is being sapped.

Connected with all this is the problem of the police authorities. Even those who are on police authorities barely know — indeed, some of them do not know — what are their rights and responsibilities. The system of police authorities is in chaos. I shall not dwell on the Stalker case because we have had plenty of opportunities to raise that issue, but the Manchester police authority quite plainly has not understood the responsibilities placed upon it under section 86 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in relation to Mr. Stalker. However, it is not surprising that it has not understood its responsibilities, because they are almost completely incomprehensible.

More than 20 years after the last Royal Commission on the police there is a great need to look once again—in a society that has changed so much and, in the context of policing, in a society that has changed so dramatically—at the role and structure of the police and police authorities. What has been said by the two Front Bench spokesmen in the debate is symptomatic of the fact that neither the Government nor the Labour party are going to the root causes of the malaise in the policy towards policing and, to an extent, in the police themselves. They are simply looking at ways of trying to treat the symptoms as quickly as possible, though superficially.

I ask the Home Secretary to institute a deep and far-ranging, though not a lingering, inquiry into the police along the lines of a Royal Commission. It is quite clear from reading the Scarman report on the Brixton disturbances that there are many aspects of policing that we ought to look at from scratch.

I should like to make two other brief points to the Home Secretary, which I am sure he will accept are important. The first relates to our prisons. I was pleased to read that slopping out is to end in Wormwood Scrubs prison. I wish that we could say the same about many other prisons where slopping out still takes place. There is an abundance of evidence that savage or insanitary prisons do not prevent crime; they simply harden criminals. We have all heard and read about the Government's prison building programme. However, I ask the Home Secretary to look once again at that programme to ensure, even if he remains committed to building additional spaces into the prison system, which I believe is wrong, that there are far greater and far quicker improvements in local prisons, where many of the insanitary places are to be found, so that soon we may have at least a moderately civilised prison system.

The other specific point that I wish to mention to the Home Secretary, which I hope that the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), will be able to deal with, relates to forensic science services. There was a time when, if the police went to the scene of a crime and wanted to call in forensic, as they called them, forensic came to the scene and took their samples, and within a couple of weeks, at the most, the basics of a forensic report were available for the investigating officers. Those reports could form, and often have formed, the basis of further interviews of suspects.

One cannot underestimate the importance of forensic evidence in the investigation of a crime. Sometimes it seems to be thought that it is important only in the presentation of the case to the court, but that is not correct. When murders are committed in England and Wales and when the police inevitably have to call for forensic evidence, the fact is that nowadays they are having to wait for weeks and weeks for reports, that forensic inquiries into murder cases and other serious crimes are being stockpiled at the laboratories and that there are insufficient Home Office forensic scientists of sufficient seniority and experience to deal with all the inquiries that are made of them by the police alone.

I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) who believes that forensic science laboratories should be truly independent and fully available to both prosecution and defence. At the moment, those laboratories cannot begin to deal properly with prosecution, let alone defence. This is a scandal, because it is affecting detection rates and thus the prevention of crime. I hope that the Minister will give us some real evidence of the Government's determination to deal with the problem.

Mr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): This debate is of necessity brief, and I shall conform by being as brief as I can in my speech. The debate is about putting people first, and all kinds of people are involved in the judicial process. I share with Opposition Members a great concern about the rise in crime. However, I believe that the Government have done a great deal to strengthen and support the police, to give at least some relief to the victims of crime and to make life more difficult for the offenders.

[Mr. Mike Woodcock]

I hope that all of us are concerned about the rise in crime, and more concerned with solving the problem than in scoring political points.

The administration of justice involves more than the police, the victim and the offender. The police alone cannot prevent crime. They cannot observe every house, factory or shop, or even every motoring offence. They need the help of the public, and the success of the various home watch schemes demonstrates the potential pay-off. Justice requires the active co-operation of the public, and that demands a public that is ready and willing to help, not one that prefers to look the other way. A great deal more could be done to secure such co-operation.

I have five simple suggestions about what to do to secure more co-operation from the general public in the fight against crime. The first is the way in which we treat our civilian witnesses in the courts. Many hon. Members may have been witnesses in criminal or even civil cases and may have had experience of the treatment that we hand out to those who are giving their time to help the judicial process. Usually, witnesses are told to arrive at a court at 10 o'clock in the morning, although they may not be required by the court for hours. Often, there are no decent facilities in which to wait. They share over-crowded waiting rooms with offenders, chain smokers, and screaming children. There is nowhere comfortable to sit and coffee or tea is not made available. There is little information, even about when they will be required to give evidence to the court.

After they have waited for so long, cases are brought on largely for the convenience of the court and the professional lawyers, with little or no regard for the convenience of those who are giving their time in the fight against crime. If such witnesses are unfortunate enough to be there at lunchtime, they find that, while the prisoners go back to their cells and are given a free meal, the police retire to their staff canteens and the lawyers go back to their offices, they are left behind to fend for themselves, usually without the simplest form of guidance on where they can obtain a quick meal.

Eventually, when witnesses are called, many of them frightened, even petrified, by the experience of giving evidence, they face rigorous cross-examination, which often makes them feel that they are the criminals rather than those who are being tried. At the end, when they put in a relatively modest claim for expenses, which almost certainly will not cover their full costs, again they may be faced with cross-examination and made to feel that they are claiming something to which they are not entitled. When that ordeal is over, as Mr. Average Citizen walks out of the court, he says, "Never again. The next time I see a crime or suspicious circumstances, I shall look the other way." Witnesses in our judicial system need to feel that they are valued, well-treated and according society a privilege. All too often, the feelings engendered are the reverse.

Secondly, the public needs to have much more confidence in punishments fitting the crime. Too often offenders walk away from our courts laughing about the leniency of the sentences that are handed out. After 15 years as a magistrate, I can confidently say that this is not always the fault of the courts. Magistrates need much more freedom in selecting appropriate punishments. The short, sharp, shock treatment of detention centres for young offenders needs to be used much earlier in the hierarchy of punishment. Community service, which is excellent in concept, needs much more rigorous supervision, and, if necessary, administration by police rather than the probation service, which is often more reluctant to apply proper standards of discipline. The Home Office may believe that community service orders are alternatives to custodial sentences, but the number of hours recommended and the supervision of these schemes mean that they are no effective alternative.

Probation orders need to be more tightly supervised by a probation service that recognises that, while help is the substance of probation orders, punishment is also important. We need to move much further towards offenders paying the full cost of their crimes, particularly with vandalism, with parents being responsible for the full cost of restitution for damage by children.

Thirdly, we need, as many people have suggested, independent investigation of serious complaints against the police. I have nothing but admiration for our excellent police service. It is deservedly the envy of the world, but where corruption is involved, the public needs to have confidence that complaints are being independently investigated. Justice must be seen to be done, and that is as true in the police force as it is in the wider community.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Does my hon. Friend accept that the independent Police Complaints Authority is already able to oversee any investigation of any crime alleged against any police officer, and must be satisfied that the investigation is being conducted properly or else it can order another one?

Mr. Woodcock: I understand that that is the case. However, my hon. Friend knows that that process is not seen to be independent by members of the public. There is a great deal of support within the police force for an independent investigation system.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Police Federation — which I thought that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds represented in the House —is in favour of his views?

Mr. Woodcock: I was not aware of that fact, but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) will make himself aware of that fact, if he was not already so aware. However, time is short and I do not want this to turn into a debate about the pros and cons of the investigation of police complaints.

My fourth point is that I believe that there should be a separation of police traffic duties from other duties. Nothing alienates the public more from the police than their involvement in minor traffic offences and nothing alienates the public from the courts more than the perceived disparity in fines that are handed out for minor motoring offences and those handed out for what the public perceives as the much more serious offences of dishonesty, violence and vandalism. I do not know how that division could be brought about, but the Home Secretary should examine this carefully, because it would greatly raise the standing of the police in the eyes of the public.

Fifthly, there is a need for much better feedback from the police to those assisting and those reporting crime. Too often offences are reported by the public, who gain the impression, probably wrongly, that the police are not interested, particularly in cases of neighbourhood disputes, vandalism and nuisance. When the police take further action, there is a lack of information on what action has been taken. A short letter to those who report crimes, after the event, telling them the outcome of the investigations and thanking them for their help would be a simple matter of good public relations.

Our judicial system is the envy of the world. Our police force is second to none. But the whole judicial process demands the public's active co-operation. Much more must be done to assure the public that their help is needed and valued, and, perhaps even more importantly, that, if they give it, they will be treated with the consideration and respect that is due to them.

Several Hon. Members rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It may help the House if I say that the first Front-Bench speaker hopes to catch my eye at 6.40 pm.

6.10 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I happened to believe that the Home Secretary, the Minister of State and senior officials at the Home Office take the difficult problems of the Birmingham six extremely seriously and conscientiously. Can they say when they hope to give any response to Chris Mullin's well thought out case?

I and others have been asking questions about the forensic side of that story and about Dr. Frank Skuse. There is also the basic question whether the defence should have access to forensic science advice and expertise. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) in asking for a comment, particularly in the light of the constructive proposals put forward by Dr. Brian Caddy and the University of Strathclyde for a centre in Glasgow that would meet some of these requirements. If no response is made during questions to the Home Office, when is there likely to be one?

Some of us would be interested to hear the Home Office's view not only on the costs of the suggestions made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) but on the many savings that could result if some of them were put into practice. We often forget that the cost of crime is simply enormous.

I turn to a case that involved the knowing waste of police time. Detective Superintendent Ron Hardy and Detective Sergeant Mike Ashdown were dispatched to the West Indies to try to find out about the log book of HMS Conqueror at the time of the Ponting trial. For the sake of conciseness, I refer to the Official Report for 24 October 1985. I asked the Attorney-General:

"what was the cost of Detective Superintendent Hardy's visit to the West Indies with a colleague on the investigation relating to the loss of HMS Conqueror's log book." —[Official Report, 24 October 1985; Vol. 84, c. 191.]

The Solicitor-General replied that it was £6,940·82. That might have been justified if the Government had not known full well that the man whom they were investigating had left the Navy in July 1982, and if the then Secretary of State for Defence had not said, in reply to the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower):

"I regret to announce that our inquiries so far have failed to locate the missing logs or to identify a proven explanation for their disappearance. It is clear that the logs were compiled and probably remained on board the submarine until October or November 1982."—[Official Report, 30 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 593.]

The logs were all bound so they could not possibly have been missing until September 1982 at the very earliest. I happen to believe that no log went missing from that submarine, but the point is that the Ministry of Defence knew that the man whom it was investigating, the supplies officer of HMS Conqueror, Lieutenant Mahendra Sethia, had left the Navy in July 1982. In September 1982 he was known to be sailing round the coast of Europe in a yacht. Will the Home Office and those responsible for the police find out who authorised such a visit? Those policemen were knowingly sent on a wild-goose chase. I shall not detain the House by saying why the Government, or certain Ministers, wanted that. I merely want to know on what authority Detective Superintendent Hardy and Detective Sergeant Mike Ashdown went to the West Indies. Was it direct ministerial authority?

My last point will take a little longer. In any discussion of the fight against crime it is common ground that Ministers must be seen to be beyond reproach. Charges have been made against the Attorney-General, the Government chief Law Officer, that he knew that the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) had authorised the leak of a letter from the Solicitor-General even before the inquiry had been formally set up. I shall quote from "The Attorney General, Politics and the Public Interest" by Professor John Edwards. Professor Edwards said:

"The Attorney General, whoever he may be, is not only the legal adviser to the Crown and to the government. He is also a servant of this House. It is, from time to time, his duty to advise the House on legal matters—a duty going beyond his responsibility to this government and the Crown".

The charges are said to emanate from a Select Committee. I regard the Attorney-General as an honourable man who has given truthful answers. In fairness to him, I should be interested to know why the Select Committee did not call him if it contemplated making such accusations——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going into details that have nothing to do with the motion before us.

Mr. Dalyell: The problem is that such charges or slurs cannot be allowed to rest in limbo when a senior Minister is involved. I say——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That may be so, but this is not the time for going into details on the work of the Select Committee or on the charges that may have been made.

Mr. Dalyell: In that case, I have a question about the circumstances in which indemnity is granted. I speak as the Member of Parliament who, rightly or wrongly, named Collette Bowe in the House. The fact is that indemnity was given before 16 January. It may have been given on 13, 14 or 15 January, but it was certainly before 16 January. On 30 January the Attorney-General said:

"On 22 January, when I was given a summary shortly before receiving the report of the inquiry carried out by the head of the Civil Service."—[Official Report, 30 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 586.]

That is when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was first informed of the direct involvement of the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks.

In what circumstances does an Attorney-General give indemnity to civil servants, however senior, when Ministers, however exhalted, are involved? It seems extraordinary that indemnity was given by a senior Minister when he apparently did not know the details of the circumstances in which he gave it. Yet the right hon. and learned Gentleman told the House that it was not until 22 January that he knew the full circumstances. I happen to think that when I questioned the Attorney-General last Monday about whether he was consulted about the——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again the hon. Gentleman is going into details that are not relevant to the motion about crime which is before us. He can indulge in generalities, but he should not go into such detail.

Mr. Dalyell: This is part of the trouble. When a Member of Parliament wants to ask a senior Law Officer to make a statement to the House that involves his honour, he had better be very clear about the details before doing so. Consequently, I do not apologise for going into the details. In the light of all this, there is a solemn obligation on the Attorney-General to give his side of the story in a statement before we go into recess. I have never meant anything more than that which I have just said. I do not doubt that there is a side to the story that he can give. I do not think that he was consulted, and referring to last Monday's question——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman persists in pursuing the detail. There are ample opportunities in the House for raising details at Question Time and so on, but this is not the occasion for the hon. Gentleman to pursue this matter.

Mr. Dalyell: I shall have opportunities, and I look forward to making use of them.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): The hon. Baronet and Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) will appreciate that I cannot follow his comments but I shall speak about the Opposition motion and the Government amendment. When I first read the Opposition motion I was much encouraged because there seemed to be in all parts of the House a genuine commitment towards the objective of crime prevention.

The Opposition motion refers to a crime prevention programme, crime prevention grants, a safe estates programme and victim support schemes. The Government are already pursuing these objectives. Since the 1970s the potential for crime prevention has become increasingly apparent, especially to the Home Office, and in 1983 my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) set up the crime prevention unit which is enthusiastically supported by my right hon. Friend the present Home Secretary.

The contribution towards crime prevention in various and necessary forms has been extensive. The Department of the Environment is making £50 million available, much of it through the run-down and priority estates programme. The Manpower Services Commission is making £42 million available for various initiatives in the field of crime prevention measures. That is welcome and important because, as the House knows, 95 per cent. of crime relates to property and is controllable, if not preventable, by the interaction of local authorities, the community and the police working together.

The plausibility of the Opposition comes into question when one examines the activities of the Labour party outside the House. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has left the Chamber. He does not want to hear this or to answer the accusations that I shall make. It is extraordinary that his own local authority in the city of Manchester, which is not responsible for the police, should be so against the police service that it spends large sums of ratepayers' money on anti-police campaigns. It is against the creation of police neighbourhood watch schemes that are designed to prevent crime. Why is it that in recent years the Labour party in London has spent million of pounds on anti-police propaganda? Why do many of the London boroughs still spend large sums of money on the publication of literature against the police and do not encourage them to police council estates or to visit local authority schools?

If the Opposition motion is to have any credibility, the Opposition must address themselves to those points. They cannot escape their responsibilities, and equally if they want to see, as they suggest in their motion, an easement of pressure on the police so that they can be deployed to help the community they should say to their own supporters that the resources of the police should not have to be used at places like Wapping and should not have had to be used during the miners' dispute or today in demonstrations. The Opposition cannot have it both ways and those points must be considered in some detail and answered.

The Government have a remarkable record on the prevention of crime. That record is being sustained and increasingly the fruits are being seen. Because of the work done by and through the Department of the Environment and by many local authorities, we have seen a transformation in some of our inner city estates. In my own city of Westminster the local housing department has removed walkways and has created blocks of flats as individual homes. It has provided gardens and has cut off blocks of flats from the general neighbourhood. As a result, it is able to report a dramatic downturn in property crime such as residential burglaries. In some instances crime has been eliminated. If it can be done in the city of Westminster and elsewhere in London through the priority estate schemes, some of them in Labour boroughs, that clearly must be the way forward. Allied to that is the need to ensure that the local authority properly manages its estate. It must collect the rents and not allow arrears to accumulate, giving the impression that lawlessness is acceptable. The money must be collected so that there can be a proper maintenance and caretaker service. Where local authorities do that there is a marked downturn in crime and that benefits the community. If the Opposition believe in crime prevention, they must say to the local authorities that are Labour-controlled that this is the way forward.

The House will recall that in the Criminal Justice Act 1982 the centuries-old priority for fines to be paid by the courts to the Crown in the first instance was reversed and priority was placed upon the money collected from offenders being used in favour of victims through orders that were given absolute priority. In that instance the Government reversed the centuries-old tradition and they have also supported the National Association of Victims Support Schemes with fairly generous funding. We would all like to see more being done, but we do not want to see another form of bureaucracy being created. I urge upon my right hon. Friend the need to look at the way in which the head office of the association makes its disbursements to ensure that we do not promote bureaucracy but provide adequate funding to ensure that in the key inner city areas such schemes can be created.

I also welcome the news about the neighbourhood watch schemes. They are an undoubted success story and are to be further encouraged by the availability of a neighbourhood watch newspaper. That must be good news.

Autocrime makes up some 30 per cent. of all crime in Britain. The Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders is working with the Home Office to improve the design of motor vehicles to design out crime and that must be the way forward, just as the steering column lock that was introduced in the 1960s contributed substantially to the reduction in autocrime. It is via such strategies that we shall tackle that great block of crime.

I find it curious that in their statements the Opposition should ignore their own commitment to repeal the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. We ought to know what the Opposition will replace it with because that Act also provides for crime prevention and sets out the police powers throughout England and Wales. What is to be done about the prevention of terrorism if the Opposition succeed in their ambition to repeal the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984? That Act makes a major contribution to the prevention of crime of serious violence.

All those questions remain to be answered and if the Opposition motion is to be credible, they will have to deal with those points. I hope when their spokesman winds up. The way forward is through the crime prevention strategies of the Government and I have no hesitation in supporting the Government amendment.

6.29 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I apologise for not being here at the beginning of the debate, but I am acutely conscious of the importance of the subject and I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate.

Earlier this year, the London borough of Islington carried out a comprehensive study of about 2,000 households in its area. The results were published in preliminary form some months ago and are due to be published next month as a book, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has provided a preface.

The results of that survey demonstrate clearly how important crime and the fear of crime are to many thousands of people in my constituency. They showed, for example, that about 70 per cent. of the population of my constituency regard crime as a problem second only in the scale of problems to unemployment — 87 per cent. of people said that unemployment was the worst problem. That shows how seriously people take the problem of crime in their areas.

Here I must take issue with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), who criticised the Labour party and said that we would treat the symptoms, not the underlying causes. I listened carefully to his speech to see whether it contained anything about the underlying causes, and of course it did not. He mentioned only one of the symptoms—the different forms of policing. I shall return to that in a moment, because it is an important point. It ill-behoves him to criticise either of the two other parties which participated in this debate for not addressing the underlying causes when he put forward nothing that would tackle the underlying causes of crime and the genuine fear of crime among millions of people.

One answer to the problem of crime is good policing. Indeed, it is the only answer that the Government give. But the police must have, above all, the confidence of the community that they serve because that is the key to effective policing. In my constituency, the tenants on many estates meet their neighbourhood police officers and members and officers of the local authority on a close and regular basis to work out how their areas should be policed and what should happen to their estates to improve policing in the area.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) criticised Labour-controlled local authorities. I would have accepted that criticism readily had he, in the same breath, praised Labour-controlled local authorities such as the one that I represent, which has sat down with the police, wished to work closely with the police, invited the police on to the council estates and engineered the close co-operation that can lead to good policing. If that credit is given, perhaps we can have a more effective and constructive dialogue about the way in which local authorities and communities interact with the police in their areas.

However, when discussing crime, we must talk about much more than policing. Even more important than policing, which tries to deter and to catch criminals after the event, is crime prevention. During the past seven years, the Government have let the country down badly on crime prevention. No endless series of seminars at 10 Downing street will make up for the fact that, through the withdrawal of rate support grant, the operation of rate capping and the savage reductions in housing expenditure which the Government have inflicted on Britain, the ability of local authorities and of the agencies in the areas where crime prevention is desperately needed to carry out proper, full crime prevention measures has been destroyed.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North mentioned the improvements on some estates in his area. Of course, some local authorities of all political colours have made valiant efforts to improve conditions, including the provision of better lighting, the removal of dark corners and better security on the estates. But most local authorities have been hampered by the withdrawal of funds by the Government. During the past seven years, the Government have increased public expenditure on the forces of control after the event—the police, the judicial system and the prisons—by about 30 per cent. in real terms. In the same period, they reduced expenditure on housing by 70 per cent. in real terms. The Government's priorities are completely wrong.

To tackle the root causes of the crime wave which so many people fear and have experienced will mean tackling the deprivation, poverty and unemployment that are the generating forces behind the increase in crime and lawlessness. There is no evidence that the Government will provide constructive measures to tackle those root causes, and we shall not get them from the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and the Liberal party either.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): The hyperbole, exaggeration, malice and sheer abuse from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was nothing new.

[Mr. Ivan Lawrence]

It was vintage right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton. What is new is the Labour party's new-found concern for law and order.

When in power, the Labour party presided over the loss of 9,000 policemen, the lowering of morale to the stage where there was almost a police strike, and the withdrawal of police officers from the beat. In opposition, they have advocated political interference with policing, denigrated the police to an enormous extent, especially in London, voted against the Prevention of Terrorism Act, which probably did more than anything to stop the summer bombing campaign of the IRA, voted against the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which has equipped the police with more sensible powers to fight crime, and voted against the Public Order Bill, which will protect the elderly and other vulnerable people, whom they always say they want to protect, from violence in the street. If one adds to that their demonstrations against the rate-capping legislation, the miners' strike and the occasional utterances in favour of terrorists from some representatives of the Labour party, the public will come to the conclusion that the speech of the right hon. Member for Gorton was nothing but a pathetic joke.

What really rattles the Labour party is the fact that the Government have done so much about crime. Hardly a day goes by without some constructive action being taken. They include 14,000 more policemen; more civilian staff; a 30 per cent. increase in police resources; the implementation of most of the Scarman recommendations; the independent Police Complaints Authority; the overhaul of police training; more deterrent sentences for firearms offences, drugs traffickers, murderers of police and prison officers, child murderers and sexual offenders; the wider armoury for magistrates' courts to deal with juvenile offenders; the biggest prison building programme in history, with three new prisons built and 15 to go; the major refurbishment of 100 other prisons; the Police and Criminal Evidence Act; the Public Order Bill; the Prevention of Terrorism Act; and the subject of this debate — crime prevention — where the Government have involved the public with great success and where they have taken steps to help victims of crime, which are long overdue, with victim support schemes and extended compensation.

To say that the Government have not taken positive and effective measures against crime is nonsense. But the fact is that crime is still growing and we must face that unpleasant fact. Although there has been a most welcome reduction in some areas, such as burglary, a lot more needs to be done. The fight against crime is not being lost but it is being won too slowly. It would be won more quickly if our trials were more efficient and if we had tape-recorded interviews. What has happened to that proposal?

But there is one step which, more quickly than any other, would change the climate of crime, particularly violent crime, a step which would meet with the support of the overwhelming majority of the nation — the restoration of capital punishment. When will the Government take that important, urgent and long overdue step?

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The Government's amendment to the Labour party's motion is incredible. For a start, they now refer to an "honest policy". But what did they have before the Home Secretary did an about-turn on crime — a dishonest policy? Is that what the previous Home Secretary had? The Government's policy is supposed to be well-funded, "vigorous and coherent". It is neither. What we have had from the Government is a rapid about-turn when the present Home Secretary took over. That was done in a fit of desperation because the Government knew that they were losing the argument, and losing it badly. The tragedy is that they are continuing to lose it because the Government's underlying social and economic policies are guaranteed to make a difficult situation far worse.

The Home Secretary said that crime has been going up for some 30 years. The Labour party, inside and outside the House, has agreed that there is a problem for any Government of any political colour in Britain precisely because of structural changes, particularly in the inner city areas. What the Government did which was so bad and counter-productive was to rip off the sticking plaster of public expenditure, to create long-term mass youth unemployment and to introduce a series of other policies, some of which were referred to a few moments ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and many of which were referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), of general cuts in local authority expenditure which have such a profound effect on crime prevention.

I am even more amazed at the Liberal party's amendment. It calls upon the Government to set up a committee to look into the functioning and structure of the police. At last, the Liberal party is acknowledging that something is wrong with policing in Britain, but it does not have the courage to come forward and say what needs to be done. The Labour party has been saying that for some years and some years ago it was not very popular. Now we know that a majority of British people support better police accountability. We know that a majority of people, including the Police Federation, which did an about-turn, support an independent police complaints system. We have won two of the most crucial arguments.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), unusually for him, said the Labour party would not produce resources, but what do we read in the Liberal amendment? The Liberal party will provide immediately

"the resources necessary for an effective nationwide system of community based policing."

If a party's second task in government is to decide who will lead it, it will need a good system of community policing before trying to sort that out.

What have the Government done that has been such a failure? They talk about crime prevention. The cuts to the housing programme, pinpointed so specifically by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, are crucial. If renovation, repair and rebuild are cut out, not only can the changing population of the inner cities not be dealt with, but the older properties, which abound in our inner cities because so many of them were built in the last century, are allowed to deteriorate. That makes it easier for burglars to enter them and for them to become run-down and vandalised. Because of the Government cuts, many local authorities have had to remove people such as caretakers, public toilet attendants, park keepers and people in public transport, who not only help to prevent crime by their presence but also help to clear up the effects of vandalism and crime. The Government have cut the lot.

The Labour party is in favour of putting cameras, security locks and so on on doors, but if we only do that, as we have pointed out on many occasions, we simply create the drawbridge behind which people retreat into their own houses and take no notice of what goes on outside because there is fear outside. Those areas with a particularly high and frightening level of crime, particularly some of our high-rise blocks, need resident caretakers. That is the sort of sophisticated structure for which we are looking.

Look at what the Government have done to education. Nursery education, one o'clock clubs, polytechnics, universities and training colleges have all been cut by the Government. It is now much more difficult to enter those education structures than it was before. Now that we have long-term youth unemployment it is impossible to get those young unemployed people the places that they need.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South) rose——

Mr. Soley: No, I am sorry, I am not giving way at this time. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been here throughout the debate he would know that we have been short of time and I want to give the Minister time to reply. He can deal with the matter if he wishes. However, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman was about to say that there have not been cuts in education, we know that there have, right the way down the line, and that has affected everything from nursery education through to the polytechnics and the universities. Cuts have also had an effect on leisure and recreation generally.

If we want to see what the Government have done to make the crime situation worse, we can take no better example than the increase in the board and lodging allowance. In doing that, the Government have increased homelessness among young people. There is a direct link between crime and homelessness, alcohol abuse and homelessness and drug abuse and homelessness. Yet the Government have introduced a board and lodging scheme which is guaranteed to make homelessness worse. In doing so, they will push more young people into crime, drug addiction and alcohol abuse.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) talked about the problem of alcohol abuse. Again, the Government have no coherent policy on alcohol or drug abuse. They have no policy on fraud either for that matter, yet the impact of fraud on Britain is terrifying. The double standards of the Government can be seen by looking at the rates of imprisonment for people caught fiddling their social security claims and those people caught fiddling their income tax. There is a terrible discrepancy in the amount of money involved and between those who go to prison and those who do not.

We have heard nothing from the Government about how, in six short years, they have managed to turn the British police force, once the pride of the world, into a semi-paramilitary police force. Conservative Members talk about Wapping, but no other post-war Government would have allowed Rupert Murdoch to go on being protected by the police at the expense of the ratepayer while no effort was made to force him to negotiate. Indeed, no other Government would have looked happily on the way that he has turned his monopoly powers in the press into such an important and powerful base at the same time as being an overseas citizen.

One of the Labour party's fundamental criticisms — indeed it is one that is growing in the police force — is that the Government, more than any other, have tried to use the police as though they were their own private army. They have done that in industrial relations and the inner cities, where they hope the police will cope with the consequences of their social and economic policies.

Sir Eldon Griffiths rose——

Mr. Soley: What about the training of police officers? We know from the Metropolitan police commissioner's report that training has suffered. People have been taken off training courses concerned with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, for which, in some cases, police are given only one or two days' training, yet the Labour party is recommending a minimum of six months' training as soon as possible, eventually aiming for much longer—I hope two years.

The Government lack a policy on community policing. They will often say how marvellous community policing is, but what resources do they put into it? What are the incentives for a young officer to stay on as a community police officer? They are almost non-existent. If a police officer wants to improve his income or be promoted he must move out into car driving, to the courts, the police station or even the House of Commons. Despite that, the Government say that community policing is all-important. Let us see the colour of their money.

What about the lack of a strong inspectorate? We read the other week allegations concerning the clear-up rates in Kent. Anyone involved in the legal system knows what happens and yet we do not have an independent and strong police inspectorate to deal with it.

It is no good the Government saying that we must back the police because the public are worried, not because of one bad apple in the barrel, but because an officer who chooses to do something about what is happening cannot use the system without being made vulnerable. That has happened in the Kent constabulary and elsewhere. Until we have a strong police inspectorate, backed by a strong ombudsman, there will be trouble.

An effective system of accountability completes the package. The Government claim that neighbourhood watch, property marking and victim support are all that is needed. I am not against those schemes, but the Government know that neighbourhood watch does not work well in high crime areas. It can help to build up the community a little, but that can be successful only in conjunction with all the other schemes. Until the Government reverse their social and economic policies it will not be sufficient to wheel out a Home Secretary to deal with the faults of the previous Home Secretary.

The Government must reverse their policies and put resources into our inner cities and crime prevention. They must introduce proper police accountability, police training and an independent Police Complaints Authority. Then we might begin to reverse the damage that the Government have done to the fabric of our society.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) exceeded the time agreed, but I thought it worthwhile for the House to hear the threadbare nature of the Opposition's case. The hon. Gentleman wants more accountability, a different Police Complaints Authority, more control over the police, more bureaucracy and less effort for those really concerned. The Opposition have the temerity to talk about putting the people first. They do not want to put people first, but they do want political control over the police. Let no one be under any illusion about that.

We were grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) for his modest sermon. I assure him that we are worried about the connection between alcohol and crime. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already taken an initiative and the issue is being examined by one of the working groups that we have set up in the crime prevention standing conference.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred to the forensic science service, as did the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I accept that the forensic science service is under great stress because of the demands upon it. There are staff vacancies. I have visited some forensic science establishments to see what might be done. Our intention is to provide the service required and to maintain the high standards of skill for which it has a high reputation.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow also mentioned other matters in connection with correspondence with my right hon. Friend. The Home Secretary has replied to him today about the forensic science service. He will also respond to the hon. Gentleman's queries about the Birmingham six. That is a complicated issue, which might require more evaluation than is involved in a mere letter sent within such a short time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock) has apologised because he has to be elsewhere at this time. He mentioned court buildings and facilities for witnesses. I shall write to him. I recognise that such issues pose major problems in handling court work sensitively and sensibly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) presented a robust view of crime prevention and of the wide range of activities in which we are engaged.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) referred to the importance of the consultative groups. Today I met Islington's consultative group and had an interesting exchange of views. I gave it substantial support for its work. With full police agreement it has set out on a range of issues which will be wholly beneficial to the community.

I cannot deal with all the issues in the few minutes remaining to me. I must deal with the main thrust of the Opposition case. They claim that the Government have failed to take any initiative to improve the climate in which crime and the fear of crime can be dealt with. This Government have virtually revolutionised the attitude towards crime prevention. Crime prevention as a policy did not exist when we came to office.

As my hon. Friends the Members for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and for Westminster, North reminded the House, this Government set up the crime prevention unit and in a relatively short period a massive range of initiatives have been taken, which even the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) should understand. We have established an evaluation of crime patterns. We have done research into individual criminal activity, into the background of crime and into particular aspects of criminal activity such as shop crime, theft and autocrime. We have changed the standing committee on crime prevention to a standing conference. Working groups are examining the whole range of criminal activity to cover autocrime, licensed premises, crimes of violence, crime on transport and so on. We have agreed with the Association of Chief Police Officers that it should set up a sub-committee on crime prevention to be chaired by the current president, Sir Stanley Bailey. The secretary will be James Anderton, the chief constable of Greater Manchester.

I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will recognise the strong input from Greater Manchester in our crime prevention initiatives. They will certainly help to offset the deleterious activities of the right hon. Gentleman's own police committee which seems to do little else but provide outrageous documentation and to undermine crime prevention.

Two national seminars have taken place at No. 10 Downing street, the first of which was run by the Prime Minister and the second of which was chaired by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. A range of agencies participated. This has already resulted in a number of new initiatives which will significantly affect criminal activity.

Mr. Kaufman: Such as?

Mr. Shaw: It is no good the right hon. Gentleman saying that. I am thinking of the decision by the British motor industry to accept a new standard for car security, the decision by the insurance industry to agree to examine reduced premiums and the decision by local authorities to take a greater interest in the provision of security systems in housing estates. I accept that Councillor Layden of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities made a contribution and we shall examine his proposition with care in the hope that we can do something akin to it.

Most crime prevention activities do not involve local authorities spending large amounts. I visited a large block of flats at Swansea recently. Caretakers have been brought back at a cost to the tenants of 40p per week, which the tenants pay willingly so that their homes are better protected and kept in better order. The environment of that estate in Swansea is an eloquent testimony to what can be done.

I visited the crime prevention project at Wellingborough. A major improvement has been made to the town centre car park there by employing staff to look after it, at a charge. We need such projects so that crime prevention activities are rooted in the community and people are helped to help themselves. We believe in putting people first.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Gerald Malone and
Mr. Francis Maude.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House reaffirms its support for the Government's commitment to pursuing an honest, vigorous and coherent policy in the fight against crime; welcomes the additional resources the Government has devoted to law and order, the success of Government backed crime prevention initiatives such as Neighbourhood Watch and property marking schemes, the encouragement given to local crime prevention initiatives, and the development of victim support schemes; expresses support for the police in their efforts to build closer links with the community; and believes everybody has a responsibility to participate in the fight against crime.

Gas Bill (Allocation of Time)

7.13 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I beg to move,

That the Order [17th February] be supplemented as follows:

Lords Amendments

1.—(1) The proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting and, subject to the provisions of the Order [17th February], those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion two hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order.

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(3) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the Amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment, as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or as the case may be, in their Amendment, as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to each Amendment designated by Mr. Speaker which has not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Amendment; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3.—(1) The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

(2) For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of each remaining item designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Proposal; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

4.—(1) In this paragraph 'the proceedings' means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration), a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

We have debated the Gas Bill at considerable length on the Floor of the House and in Committee, and it has been debated in another place as well. Both Houses have spent about 260 hours debating the Bill. In this place we debated 370 amendments, and some 630 amendments were considered in another place. Altogether, about 1,000 amendments have been debated. Tonight we have 32 amendments before us from another place, the majority of which are of a drafting or technical nature. The few that are of substance are very much in response to views that have been expressed in the House and in another place. I am glad that the Government have been able to respond.

In these circumstances, I believe that the terms of the motion should be adequate for our consideration of the Lords amendments.

Mr. Stan Orme (Salford, East): First, I inform the House that, because of the shortage of time, we shall not divide the House when the Question is put on the motion. None the less, we think that the provision of time is outrageously short, especially when we bear in mind the debates that have taken place in another place.

I have been informed that the Government, according to the Denning amendment, would have to inform trade unions of the legal, economic and social implications of the transfer and that the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employees) Regulations 1981 provide that the Government have to disclose how many men would be redundant and what alternative work would be obtained for them. That issue was debated in another place last Thursday. This afternoon the Leader of the House told us that the Dockyard Services Bill, which is affected by the Denning amendment and which the Government were unable to proceed with last Friday, will be introduced on Wednesday. I understand that negotiations are still taking place with Lord Denning. We claim that there is an analogy with the Gas Bill.

I have been informed by the trade unions that in the light of a statement made last week in another place the British Gas Corporation has done all that it can to comply with the TUPE '81 regulations. The trade unions, however, are of the opinion that there has not been adequate or sufficient consultation about the intended transfer and that all the information required by the regulations to be made available has not been supplied. This includes the legal, economic and social implications of the transfer for all affected employees.

[Mr. Stan Orme]

I understand that the trade unions are prepared to take any necessary legal action to protect the rights which the regulations give to their members who are employed by the British Gas Corporation. The Secretary of State laughs, but if the issue goes to court he might end up laughing on the other side of his face. I ask the Minister of State to explain whether the issue that I have outlined will have an effect on the Bill and will delay the sale of the shares of British Gas. The House is entitled to an answer to an extremely important question which has arisen during the passage of the Bill in another place. I ask the Minister to respond.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I shall respond to the right hon. Gentleman's question, but I think that he is making a great deal out of very little. Last week in another place it was explained that the policy of British Gas from the outset has been to comply with all the requirements of the regulations to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. Such are management-employee relations within British Gas that, as was made clear last week, the corporation has taken great care, which it always does, to go beyond merely fulfilling the letter of the obligations that it has to its employees. British Gas has already done all that it can do to comply with the requirements set out in the regulations and to inform and consult the trade unions.

There is one exception, to which reference was made last week, and that is the actual date of transfer from the corporation to the plc. Once the Bill becomes law and the Government are able to announce the timetable leading up to privatisation and the sale of shares, British Gas will immediately inform the unions of the transfer date. I hope that the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) realises that British Gas has fully informed and consulted the trade unions. In addition, my right hon. Friend and I have always made ourselves available during the passage of the Bill to discuss the matter with the trade unions. We had two meetings with the Gas Unions Against Retail Denationalisation organisation that represents the unions involved in British Gas. At the end of both those meetings, my right hon. Friend invited representatives of the organisation to refer to him at any time any matter for clarification.

My right hon. Friend and I also had a meeting with the energy committee of the TUC. My right hon. Friend replied in detail to a submission that it put to us on a number of points. I have amplified the consultations that Ministers have had with the unions concerned. I assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House that the unions have been fully informed and consulted at all stages.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Order [17th February] be supplemented as follows:

Lords Amendments

1.—(1) The proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting and, subject to the provisions of the Order [17th February], those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion two hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the Amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment, as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or as the case may be, in their Amendment, as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to each Amendment designated by Mr. Speaker which has not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Amendment; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3.—(1) The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

(2) For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of each remaining item designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Proposal; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

4.—(1) In this paragraph 'the proceedings' means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration), a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

Orders of the Day

Gas Bill

Lords amendments considered

Clause 1

THE DIRECTOR GENERAL OF GAS SUPPLY

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 6, leave out "notice in writing" and insert "reasonable notice".

7.21 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments:

No. 6, in clause 11, page 11, line 28, leave out "in writing".

No. 12, in clause 38, page 40, line 37, leave out "in writing".

No. 22, in schedule 5, page 77, line 18, leave out "in writing".

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The House is aware that concern was expressed in another place that the director might, under certain circumstances, resign at short notice, whereby there would be insufficient time to find a suitable replacement. The suggestion was made that if a formulation could be found requiring reasonable notice, a suitable constraint would be introduced. The amendment put forward by the Government in another place achieved precisely that effect but it also removed the words "in writing", which we think are redundant. They are already included in the definition of notice in clause 48. That is also the effect of amendments Nos. 6, 12 and 22, which leave out the redundant words "in writing". I hope that the House will have no difficulty with the amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 2

THE GAS CONSUMERS' COUNCIL

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 2, line 22, leave out from "shall" to end of line 25 and insert

"so far as practicable, ensure—

(a) that the members of the Council include members who, by reason of their familiarity with the special requirements and circumstances of the different areas of Great Britain or of small businesses, are able together to represent the interests of consumers of gas supplied through pipes in all those areas and of such businesses; and

(b) that the interests of consumers of gas supplied through pipes in different areas are represented by different members wherever that appears to the Secretary of State to be appropriate having regard to the manner in which the various parts of the gas supply industry in Great Britain organise themselves."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, in line 6, after 'businesses', insert 'or of trade unions'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: amendment (b) to the proposed Lords amendment, in line 12, after 'members', insert

'who shall be nominated by County and District authorities'.

Lords amendment No. 10, in clause 26, in page 31, line 22, at end insert "and to the Council".

Lords amendment No. 18, in schedule 2, page 65, line 23, at end insert—

"(2A) For the purpose of ensuring that there are persons available in particular localities to assist the Council in the performance in those localities of its functions under this Act, the Council may, without any such approval as is required by subparagraph (1) above, appoint such persons to be so available as it may determine.

(2B) Persons appointed under sub-paragraph (2A) above shall not be paid any sums by the Council for or in resepect of their services except sums reimbursing them for their travelling expenses and such of their other out-of-pocket expenses as do not relate to loss of remuneration."

Mr. Orme: The amendments deal with trade union and local authority representation on consumer councils. This is linked directly to consumer representation. As we have seen from the history of Oftel, Professor Carsberg and the problems that have arisen from the British Telecommunications Bill, we believe that stronger representation is needed for consumer protection when the British Gas Corporation is transferred to a private monopoly as opposed to a public monopoly. At the moment the corporation is subject to parliamentary and ministerial accountability. The Secretary of State has been pleased to tell us on many occasions that that accountability will be removed when the corporation becomes a plc and a private monopoly.

Although there will be an office in all but one of the regions, that is no substitute for a full regional structure with sustained lay involvement. The abolition of the regional councils means that the regional offices will be rudderless. They are likely to become transmitters of policy from above instead of acting as independent representatives of their regions.

The inclusion of one regional member on a national council is hardly an adequate replacement for a full regional council. There can be no informed discussion of the issues and the problems relevant to a particular area. The Government have included in that representation country and small businesses. Local voluntary representatives will also be appointed. We are not opposed to that, but it is not sufficient. There ought to be more representation. We recommend that trade unions and local authorities should have statutory representation. That is the core of our argument.

In another place Lord Belstead talked about a rigid, regionalised structure that could be improved. How can the reduction in consumer council staff by 40 per cent., and the downgrading of the status of regional secretaries, coupled with the abolition of the councils and lay representation in favour of one centralised structure, be said to be an improvement in consumer representation? We raised this issue consistently in Committee, and it has been raised in another place. On both occasions, we have not had satisfactory answers from the Government.

Paid regional managers are not the answer to consumer representation. Because of the limited time, I shall keep my remarks fairly brief. We think that the amendments are important. We believe that the Government could accept them. They would broaden the base of consumer representation.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I am glad that the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) has moved amendment (a). I am not sure about amendment (b), since advertently, or deliberately, he has contrived to miss out Scottish regional councils.

Mr. Orme: I am sure that that is an error.

Mr. Wilson: I am sure, from the look on the right hon. Gentleman's face, that he is truly penitent, but I did not know that it was Labour party policy to go for single units in local government in Scotland. If it is, it will be an improvement.

We see in the Bill the onward march of centralisation. Prior to 1972, there were autonomous gas boards in different areas of the United Kingdom. The Scottish gas board was an independent unit and was able to take full decisions. It had control over management functions and consumer operations in Scotland. The Gas Act 1972 absorbed the Scottish gas board into the British Gas Corporation. Incidentally, that was at the same time as gas was discovered off the shore of Scotland. I have often wondered whether that was a coincidence. In due fullness of time, I have come to the conclusion that it was foreseen and that it would have been undesirable to have a Scottish gas board in possession of large quantities of natural gas exclusive of London. The Scottish gas board became a division of the British Gas Corporation. No sooner was the Bill published than we saw the encroachment of centralisation. Scottish Gas, a hallowed name in the energy field, to be was obliterated and would become British Gas (Scotland). In addition, the Bill proposed to abolish consumer councils in Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

We are seeing the creation of a huge private monopoly which will not be accountable in any way to consumers. There will be no watchdog body left in Scotland, Wales or in other areas to bark if British Gas plc acts out of turn. It is highly desirable that there should be such a watchdog separate from the consumers council in Scotland which can look at policy considerations and raise matters on behalf of consumers with the Director General of Gas Supply.

7.30 pm

It is a pity that the Lords amendment does not go far enough. It provides that "the members of the Council include members who, by reason of their familiarity with the special requirements and circumstances of the different areas of Great Britain".

They are lumped together with people who represent other interests. I am not satisfied with the formula that has been approved by the other place or with what the Government initially came up with.

We are failing to take account of the full importance of the regional factor and of the need for decentralisation of policy making, management and consultation. Since the Bill was first considered, in Scotland we have noticed that the Law Lords have allowed the TSB to become privatised and Guinness has taken over Distillers. In Committee Ministers said, "We can all trust British Gas because the management will be the same." Some of us were inclined not fully to agree with that statement. The ink on the takeover document was hardly dry when it was decided cavalierly to throw overboard the Scottish dimension—the promise had been made to maintain it—by Mr. Ernest Saunders, the chairman designate of the amalgamated company. That shows what will happen to British Gas in the self-regulated atmosphere of the City of London. It could run amok as Guinness has done. Who will be able to halt it?

I do not believe that the consumers council in Scotland will have sufficient powers to control British Gas. That is why I should have preferred British Gas to be dismembered so that regional and national companies could operate in each autonomous area of the United Kingdom. But such a formula is not available.

I welcome the Lords amendments, which are slight, but I believe that the Government have taken leave of their senses in abolishing the Gas Consumers Council for Scotland.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I am glad to be able to follow the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) who made a number of points on the creeping centralisation which has been inflicted on us by the Government and on the demise of the recognition of regional status in Britain. The Lords amendment goes some way towards recognising a regional dimension. It must be welcomed, although I believe that it was a reluctant measure by the Government and that the hon. Member for Dundee, East accepted it without much enthusiasm. The recommendations are as vague and weak as possible. We should have come to expect that from this Government. They have provided the minimum possible that they can get away with. This is a strange departure by a Government who, when they came to power, committed themselves to giving local people and areas much more responsibility and a greater say in their affairs. Instead, the amendment is minimalistic, referring to different areas without defining what they should be.

I believe that a regional structure for Britain is the right and sensible way to proceed. With such a structure, we would know precisely what we mean by different areas. The structure would be defined in the Bill and given some form of expression. I look forward to the day when that happens.

I welcome the inclusion in Lords amendment No. 2 of small businesses, although, again, there is no definition of how they shall be drawn up and who shall represent them. Close reading of the Bill has led me to believe that the people who represent the different areas of Great Britain and the representatives of small businesses must be one and the same people. I feel certain that that is not the Government's intention. I hope that the Minister will clarify that technical point and make it clear that the Government see them as being different people.

My noble Friend Lord Diamond asked the Government to reveal the overall size of the council. It was important for us to know whether those who represented the different areas of Great Britain would be swamped by the Government's nominees who represented the centralised view, which the Government put forward with such effect whenever they have the opportunity. I understand that the response in the other place was that the expected overall size of the council would be about 25 members. It will be helpful if the Minister can clarify that statement.

I welcome the Labour party's amendments. The key point is that the consumer's interest should be represented. Insofar as the trade unions have a voice which should be expressed in this regard, their representation would be welcome. However, I do not wish the council to become so overburdened with other representatives that the ordinary consumer is not properly represented.

Mr. Orme: When we talk about the trade unions, we are talking not just about the trade unions within the industry but in the wider context.

Mr. Ashdown: I am grateful for that clarification. I assumed that that was the case but it is useful to have it on the record.

Amendment (b), which refers to nomination by county and district authorities, does something to clarify an otherwise ridiculously vague definition, and I welcome it. I hope that, in the execution of the amendment, attention will be concentrated on those members "nominated by", rather than representatives of, county and district authorities. No doubt, local councillors have important views to put forward and a scattering of them should be members of the council, but I hope that county and district authorities will be prepared to nominate people other than local councillors. I welcome the amendments and hope that the Minister sees fit to accept them because they strengthen the Bill.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I support the two amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). Throughout the passage of the Bill, Labour Members have recognised, despite their opposition to the principle of the Bill, that the Government with their majority would force the Bill through regardless of whether it was a good Bill for energy and for consumers. We have always sought to protect consumers' interests. That is why, even at this late stage, we put forward two amendments. The Government have repeatedly assured us that they believe that the consumers have been given the best ever deal with this Bill. We totally reject that view and believe that there is insufficient protection for the consumer in the Bill. It is vital to improve the role of consumers, especially once we have moved from a public to a private monopoly.

We have never argued that the present protection and safeguards for consumers are perfect, but we believe that now is the right time to improve them. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) referred to the words "nominated by" in our second amendment. He was right to take the wider interpretation. It was not intended that they should necessarily be district or county councillors, although some might be. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) was right to make the point about Scotland and about the miswording of the amendment. Even last week the Bill was still being debated in the House of Lords, so the amendment had to be drafted at very short notice.

Both our amendments are important. The one seeks to involve trade unionists, giving them a voice on the Gas Consumers Council and the other seeks to ensure that representatives are nominated by county and district councils. We recognise that the Lords amendment is a slight improvement on the wording of the Bill when it left this House but even at this late stage it would be further improved by our amendments.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): We hope that the House will support the amendments as they would considerably improve the Bill. Throughout the Committee stage we were extremely concerned at the lack of input in the control of the gas industry from people other than the poodles appointed by the Secretary of State. Throughout the passage of the Bill Ministers have taken a Stalinist attitude, increasingly gathering all power to the centre, which is so much a feature of Government policy and of the Bill. Our views will not find much support from the alliance, which did not provide much support in Committee. Nevertheless, it is nice to see the alliance achieving some kind of presence today.

It is important for district and county councils to participate, especially at regional level, because nominations will otherwise be entirely in the hands of the Secretary of State, which is a negation of democracy and democratic accountability to the consumer. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) made heavy weather of consumer interests and the alliance being the party of the consumer, but my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) argued that point strongly in Committee. That is why we have put down these amendments. We want greater participation in the control of the industry.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I wish briefly to support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and others who have spoken in this short debate. Our opposition to the Bill since it began its passage through the House has been based on the inability of the consumer to make a major impact on this privatised monopoly. We are totally dissatisfied with the Ofgas proposal and the proposal for the Gas Consumers Council. We want a much more powerful regulatory body and function and a much stronger consumer voice than is proposed in the Bill.

The Lords amendment is welcome, but it is extremely modest. The Labour party's amendments strengthen it somewhat and are thus also welcome. Nevertheless, we should go much further. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) pointed out that regional representation and national representation of the regions had been considerably weakened. The Northern Gas Consumers Council has made strong representations to me. It also made proposals to the Government about ways in which it could be much better integrated into the system proposed in the Bill, but those proposals fell on deaf ears, as have all other proposals to give the consumer a stronger voice than the Bill at present proposes.

The cost of Ofgas and the Gas Consumers Council will be about £2 million, which is only two thirds of the cost of Oftel, the organisation that regulates British Telecom. We see no reason why the functions of Ofgas and the Gas Consumers Council should be less necessary than those of Oftel. We want a pledge from the Government substantially to increase the powers and resources of the regulatory body and of the council. We therefore support the Labour party's amendments and look forward to proper regulation of this privatised monopoly at some time in the future.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): We are grateful for the support of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). If he had followed the detailed consideration of the Bill, he would know that the arguments that he has advanced today were put time and again in Committee. Had the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) been present today, he could have confirmed that he joined us in our efforts to secure the very improvements that the hon. Member for Stockton, South seeks.

Mr. Ashdown: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will inform his hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) of that. My hon. Friend was assiduous in his attendance in Committee. I am told by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), and the record shows, that my hon. Friend also voted assiduously throughout proceedings on the Bill. The criticism advanced by the hon. Member for Rhondda was therefore mean spirited, unnatural and unreasonable.

Mr. Hardy: I confirm that on those occasions when the hon. Member for Gordon was present he generally supported us. That is the most generous gesture that I am prepared to make as I have great sympathy with the view advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers). Nevertheless, we are grateful for the support, modest though it may be and modest though our proposals are—modest because there is no chance of the Government accepting anything better.

We recognise the importance of small businesses, and our amendment neither denies nor decries them. There are many small businesses in Britain, perhaps many more than there were a few years ago. That is inevitable as people try to escape crippling dependency and to find an occupation after unemployment. Moreover, many businesses have contracted so much that they are small businesses now when a little while ago they were quite substantial. We appreciate that one of the hopes for Britain lies in the growth of small businesses and we do not depart from the change made in the other place, but, just as we believe that the voice of the small business should be heard, we believe that the voice of the consumer, too, must be heeded.

There is no organisation of greater significance than the trade union movement representing consumers in Great Britain. Many millions of consumers are members of trade unions and both lay and full-time officials are perhaps more familiar with the concerns and anxieties of ordinary people than any other organisation in Britain. We are not asking a great deal. The Minister said that he was eager and grateful — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) should pay attention as there are many trade union members in his constituency.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): There are only seven other Labour Members in the Chamber.

Mr. Hardy: We seek to give those trade union members the opportunity to voice the anxieties of the hon. Gentleman's constituents as well as our own. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, I shall be glad to give way. If not, perhaps he will recognise that we are putting forward a valid and reasonable argument. [Interruption.] I can only suppose that the hon. Gentleman enjoyed his weekend enormously.

The Government recognised the importance of trade unions when they said that the door was open and that they were always willing to see them to discuss the Bill. If that was so while the Bill was under consideration, it is reasonable to suggest that the trade unions should have some recognition as proposed in one of the two amendments.

The trade union movement is in need of a gesture. I learnt the other day—when this is generally known, I believe that it will cause considerable resentment in the industry — that the firm of Young and Rubicam, advertising agents in New York, is being paid £15 million to advertise the flotation of British Gas in the United States. That is perhaps a slightly larger amount than the value of the free shares that will accrue to the near 100,000 employees of British Gas. Therefore, the Government will be demonstrating how little regard they have for those who have made the British gas industry so successful. The employees are to receive the same value in shares as will be paid in fees to the advertising agents in New York. That serious comparison illustrates how appalling the Government's attitude is to those trade unionists in the gas industry who have helped to ensure that it is one of the most successful undertakings in Britain. The gesture for which we are asking is more than justified when we think of the fee that will be paid to the advertising agents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), who played a pertinacious part in our debates in Committee, echoed the point that was rightly made by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson). Amendment (b) is drafted as it is in the interests of brevity, but we took it that, if the Government were to accept it, they could not ignore Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hardy: I would rather not, in the interests of brevity.

The Government have made a reluctant, creeping and modest change. If the Minister is to be consistent, he should accept both our amendments. Let me illustrate the value of amendment (b). The Minister has been in the House for a long time, and during our proceedings on the Bill he frequently referred to his constituency. As the Parliamentary Under-Secretary represents a marginal seat, he will understand that people often complain to Members of Parliament and to their local authorities. Both Ministers will recognise that the local authority charged with responsibility for personal social services is perhaps extremely familiar with the difficulties and problems that people encounter in their domestic environment. Such a local authority will know who is likely to be affected by fuel poverty or who is likely to have difficulty paying the gas bill. Given the expertise that exists within local authorities, it is perfectly reasonable that amendment (b) should be proposed.

As the Minister will be aware, local authorities and the gas undertakings at present have a very good, close contact and decent relationship. Whether that relationship can remain the same when faced with a privatised monopoly is open to question. Many experienced local government officers with day-to-day responsibility in this area have some anxiety about the maintenance of that relationship. It is important for local authorities to be in contact and have dialogue with the gas undertakings. For that reason, we should enhance the prospect of the maintenance of a decent dialogue by accepting amendment (b) to allow local authority representation on the Gas Consumers Council.

I do not know how many people will serve on the council, but I gather that the Minister has about two dozen people in mind. There is surely a need for one or more of those two dozen to be serving on local authorities. The same argument applies to the trade union movement. It would be appropriate and decent to accept amendment (a) as well. Given what has happened today, that would also be a responsible gesture.

We should like to have had several hours to debate these matters, but we do not have such time. Out of the wretched two hours that have been allocated we shall be unable to vote on both the amendments. The Minister could save us the bother of voting and allow us to concentrate on the subsequent amendments if he accepted both these proposals. If he does not, I propose that we vote on amendment (b).

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am glad that the Opposition have welcomed the amendments that were made in the other place, although I appreciate that both Opposition amendments to not go as far as some hon. Members would wish.

There has never been any doubt about the value of what people with local interests can contribute to a body such as a consumers council. It was always the intention that the different areas of British Gas should be represented on the Gas Consumers Council. The amendments that were agreed in the other place, and which I commend to the House, spell that out more clearly and give effect to what hon. Members have said on earlier occasions.

No reference has been made to Lords amendment No. 18, which is also important. It provides for local representatives on an expenses-paid basis to be maintained, as is the position at present. That is something in which the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) will be particularly interested. He said that his wife had performed that useful task, and I accept that a useful job has been done by British Gas in liaison with consumers when complaints have arisen. That is another improvement to the Bill which I am glad to commend to the House.

I must refute what was said by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson). During our earlier discussions he uttered many generalities. He said that we had an integrated gas industry, that all the gas in Scotland could be taken to London and that there was centralisation. The hon. Gentleman overdoes it. I remind him that more gas is produced south of the border than is produced north of the border. I also remind him that we as a nation are enormous importers of gas. We export gas from Scotland to south of the border, but if the hon. Gentleman looks at my Department's Brown Book he will see that our main gas reserves are in the southern basin of the North sea. However, I do not intend to be drawn into an argument about where a dividing line might be drawn.

Mr. Wilson: Is the Minister not aware that it took years for the gas network to reach Scotland, and that consequently many Scottish people were prevented from obtaining supplies of cheap gas? But no sooner had the gas reached those parts of Scotland than the Government began driving up the price.

I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the parliamentary answer that he gave me today, which shows that north of 55° 50′—the Scottish jurisdiction sector—12·4 billion cu m of gas were produced from the Scottish fields. For a country of 5 million people we have no supply problems, but will the United Kingdom not have supply problems in the future because of the Government's failure to go ahead with the importation of Norwegian gas?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am not withdrawing the answer that I gave the hon. Gentleman, but I wish that he would listen to me. He should look to see where our main reserves lie in the long term. I know the hon. Gentleman's views on importation, but to go to the length of drawing a parallel with Guinness and DCL is to go too far.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) also made some general points about centralisation, and I shall deal with them in the same way. There is not over-centralisation, and we have ensured area representation, particularly through these amendments. The hon. Gentleman asked specifically about the drafting, and I can assure him that it is not defective. Those representing the particular interests of an area and the interests of a small business need not be one and the same person. I am assured that the drafting is clear on that.

The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) asked about the size of the Gas Consumers Council. We expect there to be 20 representatives on it, 12 representatives from British Gas areas and eight who are appointed for other reasons.

8 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the Minister confirm that the trade unions and county and district councils will have no part to play on that body?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. Ashdown: May I return to centralisation, which the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) also raised once he had got over his fit of pique at the result of the Newcastle-under-Lyme by-election? According to any rational judgment, the Bill amounts to a move towards centralisation. As the GCC is ultimately accountable to the House, there is a safeguard on that centralisation. However, we all know that the Government's ultimate intention is to have a more centralised body accountable, not to the House, but to the market place and the needs of commerce. Therefore, it is important to enshrine in the Bill a degree of accountability through local authorities. Surely the Minister must realise that.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman neglects the role of the Director of Ofgas, and I deny what the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) said. We have introduced an extremely rigorous regulatory system. I accept that the system does not cover as wide an area of gas supply as the alliance party may have liked, but I do not intend to debate that again tonight. We have introduced tight regulation for the areas where we believe there is a risk of monopoly power. It is interesting that a party which has been liberal in the short traditions that it has set should want greater regulation. That demonstrates the background from which alliance Members come.

The hon. Member for Yeovil should study and consult the industry. There is not a monopoly in other areas. The hon. Gentleman did not serve in Committee on the Bill, which was not his fault, but, as we have explained, we consulted other interests such as the small business sector of the CBI and it did not want regulation in the areas into which alliance Members would like to extend it. I hope that the public will take note that the alliance wishes to extend regulation, which would mean an extension of central control. That runs counter to some of the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but perhaps we should not be too unaccustomed to such inconsistencies.

I shall not go over all the arguments, because time is short. In the Bill we have attempted to introduce a completely new Gas Consumers Council structure which is partly based on experiences from the workings of the old structure. The regional structure, with the autonomous regional councils and a central council, was top heavy in terms of administration and cost effectiveness. That is why, after a careful study of that previous machinery, we have introduced a new structure. The new organisation will be smaller and more streamlined, and so long as attention is paid to the importance of the different areas of British Gas it will be equally effective on a regional level.

The amendments seek to add trade union representatives and representatives of persons nominated by county and district authorities. They are based on the Gas Act 1972, but I remind the House that those representatives were appointed to regional councils, not to the central council. When we move to the single council, the Gas Consumers Council, the basis will be different, for the reasons I gave earlier.

It is true that I have recommended the acceptance of an amendment which takes account of the needs of small businesses, but small businesses are in the consumer section of the community. Therefore, they are different from trade unions and it is not necessary to write in specific representation from that relatively small sector.

There was a very much more positive role for the direct involvement of local authorities in a regional council, as the 1972 Act recognised, but now we are talking of representatives, not to regional bodies, but to a central body, so the role of local authorities has changed. That is not to say that there is no longer a role for them, but I do not recommend writing it formally into the Bill, as these amendments suggest. The organising committee, which is setting up the Gas Consumers Council, is now considering appointments to that council and is having consultations with the various local authority associations. I should prefer to leave the provision as it stands—that is, for a national body representing consumers. It is not in anyone's best interests to write in specific representation from one sector of the community or another. For that reason, I ask the House to reject the two amendments.

Amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 2 negatived.

Amendment proposed to the Lords amendment (b), in line 12, after 'members', insert

'who shall be nominated by County and District authorities'.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

General duties of Secretary of State and Director

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 3, line 28, at end insert—

"(3) In performing his duty under subsection (2) above to exercise functions assigned to him in the manner which he considers is best calculated to protect the interests of consumers of gas supplied through pipes in respect of the quality of the gas supply services provided, the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Director shall take into account, in particular, the interests of those who are disabled or of pensionable age."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, at end add

'or who are in receipt of any social security benefit'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 5, in page 5, line 44, at end insert—

'"(aa) such conditions requiring arrangements to be made with respect to the provision of special services for meeting the needs of consumers of gas supplied through pipes who are disabled or of pensionable age as appear to the Secretary of State to be requisite or expedient having regard to those duties;"

and, as an amendment to the proposed amendment, after 'age', insert

'or who are in receipt of any social security benefit'.

Mr. Rowlands: These amendments amend interesting and important amendments made in the other place. Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 5 go some way to meet the demands made from all parts of the House from the beginning of our proceedings on the Bill that we should seek ways and means to improve the safeguards for the most disadvantaged consumers and to protect their interests wherever possible after privatisation. Therefore, we welcome the Lords amendments, but believe that they can go a lot further.

We also welcome one or two other amendments made in the other place, particularly the letter of assurance that was published in answer to the planted written question on 17 July about the various assurances given by the chairman of British Gas. I notice that all these assurances —it is important that they be clearly stated—last only as long as certain conditions in the licence. If those were removed, the assurances would fall. It is rather important that we remind ourselves of that point.

Opposition Members welcome the Government's climbdown on standing charges. The original draft proposals were revealed in The Guardian just before publication of the Bill. They suggested that standing charges, under the code, could be raised by the RPI plus. There was some alteration later with the substitution of the famous phrase "best endeavours" to maintain standing charges. I recall with interest the Under-Secretary defending those words, using his law books to tell us that they were just as good as "must", "have to be" or "essential". We are relieved to see that he has cast aside his law books and replaced them by plain, good, English.

We have at least a concession from the Government, and one for which we fought in Committee. The Committee stage would have been shorter and less arduous if those modest concessions had been made then. We are relieved that gone from the conditions on standing charges are the weasel words "best endeavours". Now, British Gas will have to ensure that any increase is no higher than the RPI.

These amendments help and assist the most disadvantaged gas consumers — the elderly, the poorest consumers and the disabled—although the best way to do so is to keep gas prices down as much as possible. It is worthwhile reminding the House of the aim of the Bill. It is paving the way for the sale of British Gas. We have discovered that the Government will raid the accounts of British Gas to the tune of £2·5 billion, after having taken nearly £500 million from the gas consumers through the gas levy, but the company will still be presented to the stock market with a huge and healthy profit.

The best way to help the poorest consumers is not by offering discount shares to some customers but by offering a lower gas tariff to all customers. Given the money that is available, which can be taken out of the British Gas Corporation, the levy and the dividend raid on the company's account before privatisation, there is a strong case for an alternative to discount share buying. We recognise that the argument is not only about tariffs and prices but about the service provided. These amendments deal with such services.

We welcome amendments Nos. 3 and 5 amending clauses 4 and 7 to take into account

"the interests of those who are disabled or of pensionable age."

The case that was argued both here and in the other place by Lord Stoddard of Swindon and others was that we should ensure that there are special provisions for the elderly, the poor and the disabled, not only on gas tariffs and prices but on services. The additional provisions offered in amendments Nos. 3 and 5, particularly in the new conditions attached to the licence, could go further and be extended to at least one other category of consumer —those in receipt of social security benefit.

The words in amendments Nos. 3 and 5 to take into account would be of a general character if there were not the benefit of a new draft condition attached to the licence which spells out specifically what they mean. I ask the House to take the amendments with the new conditions that have been proposed.

"the interests of those who are disabled or of pensionable age"

To give meaning to the new provisions in clauses 4 and 7, four special services will be offered as a condition of the licence. I have with me the form that sets them out. They include:

"examining free of charge . . . the safety of gas appliances . . . providing where practicable special controls and adaptors . . . and prepayment meters . . . providing special means of identifying officers authorised by the Supplier; and giving advice on the use of gas fittings."

Those special services will be placed in the new conditions, thereby giving meaning to amendments Nos. 3 and 5. I hope that the Minister will, in a spirit of generosity, accept our case that at least two of those four special categories could and should apply to those in receipt of social security benefit.

8.30 pm

The two that apply are those that offer the opportunity of examining free of charge the safety of gas appliances and of giving advice on the use of gas and gas fittings. The amendment paves the way for additional changes to the draft condition, which is being introduced by the Government, in order to extend some of the provisions and special services to the poorest customers who do not fall into the two specific categories of being elderly or disabled. Two of the recommendations in the conditions apply specifically to the elderly and disabled, and could and should be extended to the poorest gas consumers.

We know that neglecting the safety of gas appliances is a function not just of age or disability but often of finance. If one cannot afford to call out a gas fitter or to have a gas appliance examined, the dangers can be devastating. Thus, that is one of the four draft conditions that could easily apply to those in receipt of social security benefit, who are among the poorest of gas consumers.

Advice on the use of gas and gas fittings is as of much significance to the poorest gas consumer in our society as to the elderly or disabled. I do not detract from the value and importance of those special services to those two categories of customers, but I cannot understand the logic of not extending them to those poorest consumers who are neither elderly nor disabled.

I shall be interested to hear the Minister's reply to those points. I anticipate that he may say that a provision covering the efficient use of appliances has already been laid down in general terms in condition 13. But that could also apply to the elderly and the disabled. However, the Government have rightly and understandably sought to specify some special services which, although covered by the generic provisions of condition 13, should also be highlighted in an additional condition. We believe that the best way of assisting the poorest customer, whether elderly, disabled or simply poor, is by maintaining the lowest possible tariffs and, most importantly, by offering a range of special services to the poorest of customers. It is in that spirit of generosity that we urge the Minister to respond and to join us in supporting the amendment.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I rise to support the amendments, although I do so without much heart, because throughout our lengthy discussions on the Bill in Committee the Government turned a deaf ear to our pleas on behalf of some of the poorest consumers in our society. It became especially clear throughout our discussions on the Bill that the Government's plan to sell off British Gas to pay for tax cuts is a gigantic financial swindle. The public will undoubtedly be the losers and only the rich will benefit. Having said that, we must, even at this late stage, hope that the Government will be swayed by our arguments to try to protect some of those who will be most affected by some of the things that we predict will happen as a result of privatisation.

During the past decade the poor have suffered most from increases in fuel costs. They tend to live in bad housing, often with poor insulation. They often have damp houses that suffer from condensation. They can seldom choose the heating that they would like, and they often land up with expensive and inefficient systems. Those who can least afford it are thus forced to pay the most to keep warm. That leads to a failure to pay bills and to misery. In Committee, we gave the Government many examples of acute cases of poverty. I quoted at some length from the many reports carried out by welfare organisations on the effect of fuel poverty on people in Britain.

From the Government's own figures it seems that 60 per cent. of all people on supplementary benefit and 90 per cent. of pensioners on supplementary benefit now receive a heating addition. That makes the case for the amendments. Every winter, especially last winter, people have died from hypothermia. An increasing number of elderly people and young children die. They are often the children of families living on social security benefit. All of them are at risk, because they or their families cannot afford the fuel necessary to keep warm. Government policies, as enunciated today, will undoubtedly increase that possibility.

The causes of fuel poverty must be tackled by other changes in policy, such as housing and income support as well as fuel pricing policies. Many people simply do not have the financial resources to heat their homes properly. Fuel poverty is a real and growing problem, and the Government cannot get away from that. If the Government make special provision for the elderly and the disabled, whom we know need increased heating because of their problems, how can they exclude people on social security benefit?

From evidence produced in 1982, it seems that more than 50 per cent. of disconnections occurred in households with children under 10 years old. Of the households disconnected, two-fifths had a head of family unemployed and more than 10 per cent. had a head of family who was sick or disabled. We have been given much evidence from welfare organisations, which has shown clearly that there is a vital need for proper regulation of the relationship between the fuel supplier and its customers. Therefore, I support the amendment.

Mr. Ashdown: I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) whose work on fuel poverty is respected on both sides of the House and whose contribution to the Bill in that respect is valuable, and is recognised as such by all hon. Members. The hon. Lady made some points about hypothermia to which I shall return shortly. I shall put a slightly different emphasis on those points, but I agree that the amendment and clauses 3 and 5 are worth supporting. We shall certainly support them tonight. That was the only major concession that was wrung out of the Government. They gave it unwillingly, and struggled until the last moment. It is an official indictment of the Government that they gave it unwillingly and were forced to do so only because they recognised the argument in the last analysis.

I join the hon. Member for Cynon Valley in welcoming clauses 3 and 5. I do so unenthusiastically for two reasons. First, I believe strongly that the appropriate mechanism for assisting the disadvantaged in a civilised nation is so to construct things that they do not need any charitable or special provision. People should be able to live ordinary lives on an ordinary and dignified basis.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) made an important point when he said that the best way to assist the aged, the disabled and those who were disadvantaged for other reasons would be to provide a sufficiently low gas tariff. Overall that is the best way to assist. Another way would be to pay a decent pension so that people would not have to rely on charity, on special clauses in Bills or the hand out of free bus passes. There is a psychological attitude towards our elderly and disadvantaged people which unhappily ghettoises large numbers of people according to their disadvantages and age. That prevents them from taking their full part as members of society. That is my first reason for being unenthusiastic about the way in which we have arrived at this point.

My second reason is that once again the Government amendment is as minimal as they can allow. It uses phrases such as "take into account". One wonders why the Government were not able to include phrases such as "the needs of old-age pensioners or the disabled". Goodness knows that need is powerful and well enough established. I pay tribute to my predecessor the former Liberal candidate in the Yeovil constituency because he placed me in a position to win that seat. Much more importantly, he and his wife discovered the phenomenon which we now know as hypothermia. Many thousands of people owe him a great debt for discovering that phenomenon.

As the hon. Member for Cynon Valley has said, since 1975 some 12,000 people in Britain have died from hypothermia, an average of 1,230 a year. I disagree with the hon. Member for Cynon Valley only on the matter of emphasis, because, while there is no doubt that there are well known and documented cases of young children in that tragic and awful litany of unnecessary deaths, the vast preponderance of those cases is among the aged. Four died in my constituency, not last winter mercifully but the winter before. That is a disgrace in a civilised society. However, all these points were made at length in Committee and I have no wish to delay proceedings now. Suffice it to say that, because the vast preponderance of that disgraceful total of 12,000 dying from hypothermia are the aged and among that total are a number of disabled, it is incumbent on us to recognise that there ought to be a specific recognition of the special needs of the aged.

The clause should recognise the needs of the aged and the disabled and ought to take into account the needs of those on supplementary benefit. The Government will not do that. Because the Opposition amendment would strengthen the clause, I have no objection to it. I support it perhaps more enthusiastically in clause 7 than in clause 4, but we shall vote in favour of both amendments because at least they broaden the scope, recognise the problem and strengthen the clause.

I turn now to the matter of recognition which is not voluntary but mandatory. In another place Lord Diamond, on behalf of the alliance, tried to introduce an amendment with almost exactly the same wording in line 38, page 5. This amendment is in line 44. That amendment would have made the requirements mandatory. Some of us believe that the amendment at present allows it to apply on a rather more voluntary basis. I was reassured to read in the report of the proceedings in the other place that the Government said that in their view this amendment, together with other amendments, make this requirement mandatory. It would be of benefit to the House if the Minister would confirm that point. I repeat that this amendment lays down a duty which is not voluntary but mandatory. If he will give us precisely the argument for that, it will go on the record and then there can be no doubt.

8.45 pm

Mr. Pike: I support the amendment because it is probably one of the most important improvements of the Bill. However, it could go a little further. That is why we are moving our amendment and a similar one to a later clause in the Bill. People on social security benefit are among the most deprived and poorest in Britain. Some people who are unable to go out because of poverty require more heat in their homes than people who are able to go out during the day. That also applies to the unemployed, especially in winter because they find it difficult to go out in bad weather.

We all know that any form of heating is expensive. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and others of my hon. Friends amply illustrated in Committee the fact that many people in the categories that we are discussing often had a choice between food and heating. It is atrocious that in 1986 people should have to choose between those two basic necessities of life. An announcement made in the House earlier today will worsen the situation. Last year, one of my constituents had to make a choice every weekend between food and heat.

The complications of the exceptionally severe weather payments make it far too difficult for many people to acquire the benefit to which they are entitled. Many people dare not run their heating systems at a sufficient level because they are terrified about having to obtain the benefit to which they might be entitled under the scheme. In many instances they do not know about the scheme until it is too late. We are talking not just about the elderly or the disabled, although I recognise and fully support the needs of those two categories.

At the moment I am dealing with the family whose gas was cut off last winter. They owe about £340 and the gas board has made it clear that, unless the family pays off the arrears at £10 a week until the debt is repaid, the gas supply will not be reconnected. There are children in that family which is on supplementary benefit. It means that, with repayments of £10 a week for 34 weeks, that family will not have gas heating next winter. The amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) is an important addition to the Bill. If the Government care or have any sympathy for the poorest members in our society, they will accept it.

Mr. Wilson: I support the amendment because it is a valuable reflection of the importance that the Opposition parties at least attach to fuel poverty. It is recognised that many people die because of a lack of adequate income with which to buy heat, and that is compounded by the fact that many such people live in houses with inbuilt ventilation. The blocks are porous and the windows do not fit and heat cannot be contained in the building. Compared with Scandinavia, we treat the matter of heating for our people in a scandalous fashion.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not just hypothermia, but the fear and dread of the expense of heating from which old people suffer?

Mr. Wilson: I agree with the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). I have had discussions with the Department of Health and Social Security about the possibilities of establishing a cold climate allowance. One of the answers is that spending does not necessarily reflect the severity of climate. Indeed, some family surveys show that. What it means is that, in many areas, the elderly simply do not use fuel. They are frightened to use fuel and, therefore, live in a colder environment. That has been documented many times by medical people who admit that hypothermia exists.

I commend the Lords amendment and hope that, even at the last moment, the Government will accept it. The Labour party's amendment to it recognises the need to cater for the vast numbers of people who receive supplementary benefit. A fuel poverty document that I received today said that 5 million people receive supplementary benefit. I am not sure whether the family of four is still the unit, but, even with families of three, that means that 15 million people live or depend upon supplementary benefit. They have insufficient money on which to live.

In considering the privatisation of British Gas, we must examine what can be done. Since I have commended the Labour party, perhaps I should criticise it for what the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said about a winter premium of £5 a week. Of course, that is a flat rate. Whether people live at the Oval or in Shetland, regardless of climate, they will receive the same sum. If they must die because the payment is not related to climate, that is just too bad. I hope that those Labour Members present will recognise the justice of the case for climatically adjusted allowances and press the hon. Member for Oldham, West into action.

If we change the way in which British Gas is financed and run, problems could arise in relation to gas supply. I have a copy of the 1985-86 annual report of the Gas Consumers Council for Scotland, which the Government will have found uncomfortable reading. Perhaps that is one reason why the consumers councils are being abolished. It states:

"One of the most worrying trends in the past year has been the steep increase in the number of people being cut off because they could not pay their gas bills. Disconnections have risen from 2,249 to 2,843, an increase of nearly 21 per cent. over 1984-85. We have continued to examine a sample of cases each month."

The council exonerates British Gas on the matter because it has followed the code of practice. However, the council says that the code of practice is probably at fault and must be amended. It says that there is "no satisfactory explanation for this increase other than the prevailing economic climate."

For many families without an adequate income, fuel debt will increase or they will be cut off.

In those circumstances, does the Bill do enough, even if amended by the Lords, to take account of that fact? I do not believe that it does, in two respects. First, in relation to maintenance, the Government have announced that they intend to restrict the number of single payments that can be made, sometimes for the purchase and sometimes for the maintenance of equipment. There is a danger factor associated with gas which is not necessarily associated with electricity. Danger could arise if people bought stoves that were not properly maintained and could not afford to get them repaired because of a lack of single payments. If heating allowances are phased out, as they will be, there will be more poverty and more likelihood of danger.

In the latter circumstances, it would be useful if British Gas made available an advisory service that would allow those in receipt of supplementary benefit to obtain help and advice without having to pay through the nose for it. Frequently, they get no help or advice at all. Advice on heating, combined with the payments for insulation which, thankfully, the Government intend to retain, could save many families from hypothermia and from being cut off. It would be easy to set up such an advisory service and maintenance checks.

I hope that the Government will accept the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) calling for the inclusion of those on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As with the previous group of amendments, I am grateful to the House for welcoming the changes that were made in the House of Lords — changes and amendments which I shall commend to the House. But we are now debating the two amendments tabled by the Opposition.

The remarks of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) were strange. He paid respect, fairly, to the amendment and to the need to help those in receipt of social security, but he addressed almost all his remarks to the problems of the elderly. I refer him to amendment No. 5, which contains words almost identical to the ones that he used about meeting the needs of consumers who are elderly and disabled. He might have showed some graciousness and accepted that we have incorporated precisely what he wants.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me whether the provision is mandatory. Given the responsibility that is laid on the Secretary of State, I cannot envisage circumstances in which he could properly omit a condition in the licence on special services to the elderly and the disabled. Once that is included in the licence, if the public gas supplier breaches the conditions of the licence it will be extremely serious, as the hon. Gentleman will know from other parts of the Bill, and various matters will flow from it. The licence can be enforced and certain steps taken if the public gas supplier is in breach of the licence. The real power lies in ensuring that that is done.

The main reason why the Lords amendments concentrated on the elderly and the disabled is that those categories are unlikely to be able to examine their appliances in the same way as a fit and able-bodied person could. That is why we decided to offer those special services only to the elderly and disabled. The provision will not relate to financial means. We are much more concerned with the physical ability of particular classes of consumer to be able to perform tasks that are necessary in the interests of safety — for example, the problems that an elderly or disabled person has in being able to go for advice to a gas showroom. Such people may be confined to the home. It is on that that the amendments from the other place concentrate. Other services are available, but people who want to take advantage of them do have to go to a showroom. Thus, we have limited the amendments from the other place to those who are old, which may mean they are immobile, and who have problems with understanding how appliances work — problems which those in receipt of social security payments will not necessarily suffer from.

Mr. Rowlands: I am worried about the drift of the Minister's argument. It is not only the old and disabled who should not be tampering with appliances in order to decide whether they are safe. Safety is not just a problem for the old and disabled; it is a matter of knowledge. If the Minister is making the point that we are specialising in giving advice to the elderly and disabled at home, he should amend the draft condition.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The draft condition is adequate and covers advice to be given. That can be understood from any reasonable reading. That is something that British Gas has done up to now for the elderly.

I understand a great deal of what Opposition Members have said about financial help, although they sometimes overdramatise. Financial help is in a different category from what we are seeking to do relating to services. I remind the House that for pensioners the weekly scale rates for help for heating have increased by more than 6 per cent. in real terms since 1978.

For those who require more general help for heating we have increased the size of the heating additions and their availability. It is significant that they are now worth £140 million more in real terms than they were in 1979. Therefore, the Government have taken positive action to give financial help where it is needed, to which so much reference has been made. The Government need no lectures from the Opposition on the problems of those on lower incomes who need help for heating additions and in answering those needs. We have done that on a scale far greater than at any time when the Labour party had responsibility for that.

The services available to the two categories of consumers to whom the amendments from the other place apply, which I commend to the House, meet our objectives. The Government not only recognise the need for financial help but have responded to it in a real way, which the Labour party never did when it had the power to do so. I ask the House to reject the amendments to the amendments.

Mr. Rowlands: We shall be pressing our amendments, first, because the Minister ended on a controversial note. It is little wonder that the Government have had to pay more out in heating allowances when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Secretary of State for Energy, for three successive years, demanded that gas prices should rise by 10 per cent. above the rate of inflation—an increase of 100 per cent. in domestic gas prices.

Secondly, I did not find convincing his arguments against extending the special provisions for those of state pensionable age and the disabled—which we welcome—to the poorest customers in our communities, in particular, advice and assistance on the safety of gas appliances and on the use of gas. Both are vital to the poorest consumers as well as to the elderly and disabled. It is for those reasons that we shall press our amendments tonight.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

It being more than two hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the motion relating to the Gas Bill (Allocation of Time), MR. SPEAKER proposed, pursuant to the order this day, to put forthwith the Questions necessary to bring the proceedings on the Lords amendment to a conclusion.

Lords amendment No. 3 agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to. [Some with Special Entry.]

Rate Support Grants Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

ADJUSTMENTS OF DISTRIBUTION OF BLOCK GRANT

'In relation to block grant for any year beginning on or after 1st July 1987, section 59(6)(cc) of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 and section 8(3) (C) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 shall cease to have effect'.—[Mr. Straw.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.20 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 30, in schedule 1, page 5, line 47, at end insert—

'14.—(1) Section 8 of the said Act of 1982 shall be amended as follows:

(2) In subsection (4) after the words "in that paragra, ." there shall be inserted "and where he does not so provide he shall give reasons for not doing so to the association of local authorities or local authority by whom representations were made".

(3) After subsection (3) there shall be inserted—

"(3A) Expenditure of any description specified in subsection (3B) below shall be disregarded for the purposes of paragraph (CC) of subsection (6) of the said section 59 and in determining whether the extent to which local authorities have or have not complied (or have or have not taken steps to comply) with the guidance referred to in that paragraph.

(3B) (i) Expenditure grant aided by the Secretary of State under the Local Government Grants (Social Need) Act 1969;

(ii) Expenditure incurred or grants or loans made under section 138 of the Local Government Act 1972.".'.

Mr. Straw: Earlier today, Mr. Speaker, you listened to a point of order from me on the fact that the Bill might be the subject of a certificate as a money Bill. I place on record my thanks to the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government for his courtesy in letting me know about that possibility.

The purpose of new clause 1 is to remove the powers of the Secretary of State to use multipliers for the purpose of abating the grant to authorities whose expenditure exceeds their target figures. This is a useful occasion on which to debate the new clause, as it comes just a day, I understand, before the provisional announcement of the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88. We are informed by a number of newspapers that Ministers are to come to the House bearing gifts of £1 billion or so in anticipation of the general election next year.

I have always thought that we should beware of Conservative Ministers bearing gifts, especially of the size of £1 billion, even if an election is on the way. It is our intention, when we see the detail of the rate support grant settlement, to examine the small print in the greatest of detail. I shall be delighted if there is a U-turn on the issue of rate support grants. However, I suspect that there will be a small catch somewhere. If Ministers recognise the error of their ways, there is no better way to acknowledge that than by accepting new clause 1. If the Minister were to say straightaway that he accepts new clause 1, I should be happy to terminate the debate without a Division. It seems that I shall have no such luck.

The Local Government Finance Act 1982 gave the Secretary of State the power to issue—in the newspeak of the Government—expenditure guidance—the type of guidance that one receives when one's arm is forced behind one's back and which allows one to go in only one direction—or "targets", as they were commonly known, by which authorities were fined large sums of money if they exceeded the expenditure levels set by the Government. The penalties included a reduction in the grants that would have been payable by the mechanism of multipliers. The system of targets operated for the years 1981-82 to 1985-86. It was abandoned for the current year.

By the time the order was moved on 20 January this year the then Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), had been elevated from the position of Minister to that of Secretary of State. One can scarcely keep pace with his promotions. He said:

"The most important feature of the settlement next year is that we have got rid of targets. That decision has been commended by the Public Accounts Committee in its valuable report published last week. I believe that Members on both sides of the House welcome the abandonment of targets and penalties. I was repeatedly pressed by all authorities, not just the shire counties, to do that." — [Official Report, 20 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 42.]

That was welcomed by Members on both sides of the House. However, the question that we shall tease out tonight is whether that abandonment applies for only one year or for every year. We shall ask whether Ministers intend to keep the weapon of targetry in their locker so that they can have a go at local authorities as and when they please.

I hope that the Government will accept the new clause. The reason why all hon. Members welcomed the abandonment of targets and penalties was that the system had become desperately unfair and virtually unworkable. It meant that decisions on levels of expenditure were being taken centrally and not by democratically elected councillors. It meant that Ministers had to stand in the shoes of councillors to determine what was a reasonable level of spending. The consequence was wholly to distort authorities' accountability to their ratepayers, because marginal increases in expenditure resulted in a disproportionate increase in rates.

I know this as a ratepayer in Lambeth. During the last local elections we heard all the time about how wonderful Wandsworth was and how terrible Lambeth was, but we were never told that 85 per cent. of expenditure in Wandsworth was paid for by central Government, compared to only 20 per cent. in Lambeth, whereas the disparities in levels of spending were nothing like that. Over a number of years the Inner London education authority, Camden borough council and the Greater London council faced a situation in which they received no grant as a result of targetry, despite the fact that their areas covered some of the most deprived parts of the United Kingdom.

Another objection to targets was that the 1981-82 targets were based on authorities' 1979-80 budgets. The 1979-80 budgets were frozen and simply uprated roughly in line with inflation, which caused enormous distortions for low-spending and high-spending authorities.

The construction of targets changed from year to year. No authority was caught more than Birmingham. In one year, in expectation of the elections which the Conservatives were likely to lose, and indeed lost, Birmingham was brazenly assisted by changes in target and in another year was forced to put up its rates by about 43 per cent.

Above all, the equalisation objectives of the block grant system were frustrated by targets and penalties. The reason why the rate support grant system as a whole has been brought into disrepute by the Government is fundamentally to do with the target system. If targets were not operated, there could have been a consensus on the system of block grant which the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) introduced in 1980.

Amendment No. 30 does two things. It requires the Secretary of State to give his reasons for not granting disregards for the purpose of measuring local authorities' compliance with targets. It requires him to disregard altogether certain items of expenditure when measuring local authority compliance with those targets. Those issues are by no means a matter of history. The amount that individual authorities may earn by way of grant in previous years — certainly including 1983-84 and onwards — has yet to be decided because we still have not received the supplementary report for 1983-84 and subsequent years.

In most parts of the local government finance legislation under which Ministers make decisions affecting authorities Ministers are required to give reasons. They are not required to give reasons when it comes to disregard. We believe that it is only fair that authorities should know why applications for disregard have been refused. After all, they soon discover if an application for disregard has been accepted. By definition, they should know why it has been refused.

We have provided for disregards of certain items of expenditure and have given two examples: first, where expenditure has been grant-aided under the urban programme, and, secondly, where it has been incurred under section 138 of the Local Government Act 1972. By definition, where expenditure has been incurred under the urban programme, the Government have accepted that the project has a substantial priority, otherwise they would not have agreed to fund it. It is ludicrous that the Government agree to fund part of the urban programme, yet expenditure incurred by the authority can be the subject of penalty. Expenditure under section 138 is for expenditure on emergencies and disasters such as the Bradford fire, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) will confirm, and the Handsworth riots — both of which were entirely legitimate items for disregard.

9.30 pm

The fundamental issue raised in this debate is the good faith of the Government. On 20 January the then Secretary of State used words which were florid even by his standards, referring not to a decision temporarily to set targets aside but to their "abandonment". If the Government have made such a decision, it is entirely justified that that abandonment should be put into law by new clause 1.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): I support new clause 1 and amendment No. 30. My hon. Friend the Member for

[Ms. Harriet Harman]

Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has said that the system is unfair and unworkable. I wish to give just one illustration of that unfairness in relation to Southwark council.

Southwark council is threatened with a loss of £6·84 million in rate support grant between 1985-86 and 1986-87. That is 10 per cent. of the Government's contribution, which has also already shrunk by almost half — from £83,300,000 in 1978-79 to £42,532,000 in 1985-86. I hope that the Government will think again and not make that further 10 per cent. cut in an already greatly shrunken contribution.

The proposed cut is inconsistent because the Paymaster General himself has recognised the problems of Southwark by sending in a task force which is supposed to sort out the problems of deprivation. He said that he had picked as task force areas

"eight areas which are diverse in character but whose residents all share problems of deprivation and lack of opportunities".—[Official Report, 6 February 1986; Vol. 91, c. 446.]

He said that all the areas suffered from a wide range of long-standing problems.

A Minister from the Department of the Environment has also recognised the problems of deprivation in Southwark. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), wrote to the council saying that he recognised that the deprivation was such that Southwark qualified as one of a handful of areas whose needs compared with those of neighbouring programme status authorities.

The inconsistency of the Government's attitude is heightened by the fact that the then Secretary of State, now Secretary of State for Education and Science, told local authorities as recently as March this year that they should actually spend more. Yet Southwark is now to have 10 per cent. lopped off the Government's rate support grant contribution.

Ironically, the task force was supposed to be an example of co-operation among different Departments working together to meet the needs of one deprived area. Yet Government Departments are not only failing to co-operate but seem actually to be working against one another. One Department is lopping off £6·84 million while another gives back £1 million. That makes no sense at all.

Not only is there no co-operation between Departments, but there is not even consistency within Departments. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State recognises the deprivation in Southwark and, as he says in his letter of 19 August 1985,

"the determination of the Council to make good use of whatever resources are made available," while the Secretary of State seeks to penalise the authority by taking money away from it.

I hope that the Government will realise the effect that the threatened cut would have on jobs and services in Southwark, reconsider the amount to be taken by their curious system which they call multipliers and which really is a system of subtraction, accept the new clause and the amendment, and think again about the proposed cut in rate support grant to Southwark.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Local authorities are entitled to be given reasons for decisions that affect their budget and services. The changes made to local government finance by this Government—and they have been fast and furious over the past few years — often mean that local authorities are caught out and are therefore disadvantaged through no fault of their own. That is what happened to the city of Newcastle upon Tyne.

In 1982-83, Newcastle city council decided to amend its accounting practice for the treatment of income from other local education authorities in respect of students attending advanced further education courses in Newcastle. Prior to 1982-83, the income taken into account in respect of any one financial year related to the previous academic year. For example, in the financial year 1981-82, income was taken into account for the academic year September 1980 to August 1981.

This change in practice meant that for 1982-83 onwards the income related to the financial year. For example, in 1985-86, income taken into account was for the summer term of the academic year 1984-85 and the winter and spring terms of the academic year 1985-86. For one year only — 1982-83 — the income for five terms was taken into account due to the change in practice. That was for the academic year 1981-82 and two terms in 1982-83. That led to a one-off gain of £2 million which, in accordance with standard accounting practice, was treated in the accounts as a prior year adjustment. In other words, the previous year's figures were changed rather than those in 1982-83.

The budget return for 1982-83 included this income, which has had the effect of reducing total expenditure for block grant purposes and, because the city was subject to negative grant rates, of increasing grant entitlement. It was generally understood that this was the correct treatment of prior year adjustments for block grant purposes. Subsequently, the budget for 1982-83 formed the basis of the city's target for 1983-84, which itself formed the basis of the targets for 1984-85 and 1985-86. As a result, the city's targets were understated in each of these years, and that lost the city several million pounds in block grant.

The city did not complain at the time because it was believed that the budget had been returned on the correct basis and that, when the prior year adjustment was made, that would gain the city grant, partly but by no means completely offsetting the effect of the reduced target.

In February 1985, the Department of the Environment informed local authorities that prior year adjustments were neutral for block grant. That was intended to be helpful to local authorities, but it was probably not envisaged that it would have the kind of effect that it had on Newcastle — that income items such as the city's adjustment would not attract grant. The Department of the Environment invited authorities to amend block grant claims going back to 1982-83 to take advantage of this interpretation. Accordingly, the city amended its grant claims but also requested the Department to accept an amended budget return and to recalculate the city's grant entitlement on the basis of revised targets.

The council wrote in May 1985—three Secretaries of State for the Environment ago — asking for its block grant to be recalculated on the basis of the amended forms. In July 1985 — two Secretaries of State for the Environment ago — it was told that the Secretary of State

"would carefully consider their representations for disregards as soon as possible, but anyway before final decisions on grant abatement for relevant years, and that only initial consideration had been given before making and laying the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report 1985-86."

The council was also told that

"the Secretary of State had always recognised that the reference to 1982-83 budgets carried a risk that anomalous features could be perpetuated but that he thought in most cases authorities should be expected to live with them, though if there were a truly exceptional case, that could be dealt with by way of a disregard under section 8(4) of the 1982 Act."

On 19 December the Department wrote to say that the Secretary of State had considered the representations but decided not to make any provision for such a disregard. No reasons were given. The council thought that it was a harsh, unjustified decision, particularly in view of the injustice of penalties, and it was surprised that there was no explanation. It pointed out that there were precedents for granting such disregards and directed the Secretary of State's attention to the supplementary report of 1982-83 and asked why he had not followed that precedent. The response to that letter was simply to say that it was not the Secretary of State's practice to give his reasons for refusing to grant a disregard.

The council was and is entitled to a full explanation. It wrote to the Members of Parliament for the city, and I wrote on their behalf to the Secretary of State, asking for information on at least two occasions, and then I tabled a parliamentary question. The reply I received was:

"The Secretary of State does not consider that he is under any duty to explain his reasons for refusing to grant Newcastle a disregard."

One man has the power to affect extremely damagingly the finances of major cities, with all the consequences that that will have on their citizens. Yet he does not have to explain why he has made his decisions, even to the House. That cannot be right. Amendment No. 30 attempts to rectify and restore the rights of Members of Parliament to get answers to questions, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I wish to speak briefly on a question pertaining to my constituents. Contrary to some of the generally accepted conventional wisdom which we hear from the Opposition, some Labour-controlled county councils, including Staffordshire, have benefited enormously from Government policies on rate support grant. They do not use that money wisely. In April Staffordshire county council received a £9·2 million guarantee, followed by an uplift to about £11 million, and the money for the Stoke-on-Trent garden festival, which is about £30 million. Yet the borough of Stafford has not increased the rates significantly or at all for the past four years, and the whole weight and burden of the county's financial affairs fall heavily on my constituents.

Education takes up 70 per cent. of the entire budget and the district auditor has criticised the county council for the way in which it has arrived at its figures, so one is left feeling extremely worried about education and the appalling way in which the county council's finances are being run. Indeed, it has reached the point when the Bishop of Stafford, the young farmers' clubs and others have had to run a campaign, reminding Staffordshire county council of its 1985 election manifesto, in which it gave a specific commitment to maintain the level of expenditure on voluntary organisations. Since then the council has closed a special school, despite a petition signed by 15,000 people, many of whom came from the lower socio-economic grouping of Stoke-on-Trent, against the closure. Furthermore, the council has been parsimonious and miserly in dealing with citizens advice bureaux. Staffordshire is about the only county in England and Wales which made no contribution to the CAB. I had to fight to ensure that the money was paid by the county council.

Furthermore, more recently, the schools letting policy has caused great problems for the scouts and other voluntary organisations. Finally, the Marriage Guidance Council came to me recently and said that it had merely received £165 at a time when divorce rates are high and when the opportunities that should be made available through moneys from the county council are not forthcoming. The chairman of the Marriage Guidance Council is extremely worried about whether it could continue. The Opposition parrot on about cuts and cuts. I invite the Minister to look at the amount of money that has gone to Staffordshire and then to consider the amount that has been paid out by my constituents. They pay more money into the coffers of Staffordshire county council than any other party, yet the county council is imposing swingeing cuts on education and proposes to close a huge number of schools. I am fighting that proposal for reasons I have already given — the money has been made available by this Government to Staffordshire county council, yet all that it does is to complain and whinge about the amount of money that it would like to have.

Staffordshire people are enterprising. They run many small businesses and also highly sophisticated and well-run companies such as GEC, Evode, Lotus and others. They are contributing to the wealth of this country and they are providing opportunities for my constituents. It is hypocritical in the extreme for the Opposition to complain about the amount of money that is made available to county councils when the Staffordshire county council in particular receives so much but regrettably spends it so badly.

9.45 pm

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): My main contribution will be on another amendment. However, I should like to put a question to the Minister on this clause. Nottinghamshire county council went to court in March to get a judgment against the Minister. The case is now to be heard in October. The sum involved is £18 million. Will the Minister confirm that the county council will still be able to go to court if the Bill is passed, or will this retrospective legislation put a stop to that?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): As the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) pointed out, the effect of the new clause would be to render inoperative the Secretary of State's current powers to use both targets and hold back to influence local government expenditure in the years beginning on or after 1 April 1987. As he rightly pointed out, for the year 1986-87 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State decided not to issue expenditure guidance, as we term it, and therefore did not use either the operation of targets or hold back. However, we do not believe that it would be a good idea to take these provisions off the statute book. We profoundly hope that it will be unnecessary to introduce targets in subsequent years, but that depends upon the level at which local authorities spend. Furthermore, at some future stage there may be general economic circumstances or conditions which could require local authorities to be subjected to some form of control.

[Mrs. Angela Rumbold]

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) for his clear exposition of the great difficulties in which Staffordshire county council has placed his constituents.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask for only one hon. Member at a time.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans, as far as I know, to reintroduce targets and holdback.

The Opposition have made a number of points in support of amendment No. 30. I refer in particular to the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland). He said that the Secretary of State should be required by law to say why he has turned down requests for disregard under section 8(4) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is not required to give reasons. His general policy is that he does not wish to do so, and he does not.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge gave a long list of the difficulties in which Newcastle finds itself, but the House will appreciate that an enormous volume of work would be involved if the Secretary of State were to give reasons in the case of each application for disregard. Each local authority has the right to ask for disregards under section 8(4). In addition, local authority associations can ask for disregards. Over the past three years, about 200 requests for disregards from local authorities and associations have been received. Giving reasons for decisions on all these would have amounted to a great deal of work for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The House will appreciate that many authorities have asked for several separate disregards, and these range from the most general categories of expenditure to specific local issues such as compensation for payments to the local mushroom farm.

Mr. Clelland: How many authorities asked for reasons why they were turned down?

Mrs. Rumbold: If every authority asked for specific reasons, we would have to do an enormous amount of work. Therefore, as a general policy, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is able to exercise under the legislation, he has decided not give reasons.

Mr. Straw: When applications for disregards are made, Ministers always say that they will consider them seriously. That means that in every case where an application for disregard is made officials in the Department will make a submission to Ministers as to whether it should be accepted. The Minister is acknowledging that that is the case. If so, it should not involve considerable work for the Secretary of State to tell local authorities the reasons, in the submission from officials to Ministers, with which Ministers have concurred.

Mrs. Rumbold: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. It is true that all applications for disregards are given extremely careful consideration by my right hon. Friend, but it is equally true that, were reasons specifically given, it would lead almost inevitably to endless requests for further considerations and reasons. Therefore, as the present legislation allows my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State not to give general reasons, he wishes to continue with that policy.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The Minister's answer will not be acceptable to many people, given that there will at least be some guidelines that apply consistency between one decision and another. If that is the case, would it not be possible to show which of the guidelines render an application for disregard unacceptable?

Mrs. Rumbold: It is clear that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) did not listen to what I said. The policy of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is to give careful consideration to requests for disregards, but he does not wish to give his reasons for granting or refusing disregards. That is an allowable policy under the legislation.

The second part of the new clause would introduce an automatic disregard for all expenditure grants under the urban programme and all expenditure on emergencies under section 138 of the Local Government Act 1972.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) mentioned Southwark. The House will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has granted a disregard for year-on-year increases in urban programme expenditure by partnership and programme authorities for each of the years from 1981-82 to 1985-86. However, my right hon. Friend has not received any general request to disregard expenditure under section 138 of the 1972 Act, although he has received requests for specific disregards —for example, in the case of the fire at the Bradford football ground. He gives all these requests careful consideration before he reaches his decision. I hope that the House will agree that it would not be desirable to enshrine these two disregards in primary legislation.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I understand that a request for disregard for the cost of the Handsworth riots was turned down. If so, how does the Minister justify rejecting requests for amendment when the Government have not behaved reasonably over appeals for disregard in the past?

Mrs. Rumbold: If the hon. Lady wants my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to reconsider the matter of the Handsworth riots, she is at liberty to ask the authority to make that request, and my right hon. Friend will look at the matter carefully. There is no point at which careful consideration is not given to a request for a disregard.

In response to the right hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) I should say that the Bill will not prevent Nottingham county council from bringing its case, but it will deny it a remedy.

Mr. Straw: With the leave of the House, I shall reply briefly to the points made by the Under-Secretary of State. Her closing remarks will go down as a classic in the annals of our parliamentary debates. She said that Nottingham county council could still go to court but that the Bill would deny a remedy.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Nottingham county council might even get a judgment in its favour, but, according to the Minister, it would still be denied a remedy. Who will then pay for that?

Mr. Straw: As my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) has said, a surcharge will no doubt be levied on the councillors. But we shall come to the retrospective aspects of the Bill when we discuss amendments Nos. 1 and 3. Nothing could sum up better the Government's cynicism than the Under-Secretary of State's remarks. We found her reasons for refusing to accept amendment No. 30 and new clause 1 wholly unsatisfactory. If it is not, to use the Government's weasel words, their present intention to reintroduce targets, they should remove targetry from the statute book. We shall press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:-

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Rate Support Grants Bill, the Insolvency Bill [Lords] and the Company Directors Disqualification Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Rate Support Grants Bill

Again considered.

VALIDATION OF APPROVED BLOCK GRANT DETERMINATIONS

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 5, leave out Clause 1.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 3, in page 1, line 12, at end insert—

"(2) The multiplier set against Birmingham in the Appendix to Annex G of the Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1986-87 shall be deemed to be 1.164156".

Mr. Boyes: After lengthy proceedings in Committee, we are now back at first base. Birmingham will not get back the £7·2 million stolen from it unless clause 1 is deleted, and that is the purpose of amendment No. 1.

In Committee we attempted simply to change the date from 21 August 1986 to 31 December 1985, but that the Government found unacceptable. The reason why we wished to change that date related particularly to the consequences for Birmingham.

How the calculation that affected Birmingham's budget was made was argued at length in Committee and I do not wish to rehearse that now. However, if the Government had accepted our amendment, it would have left their main intention intact but allowed claims by other local authorities for wrongful treatment in the 1986-87 report when multipliers therein contained would not be retrospectively validated. We have no alternative now but to argue and vote for the deletion of clause 1.

Let us examine the nature of multipliers. They are complex, and, as demonstrated by the Birmingham case, can be used in a most vindictive way. During the debate on multipliers in Committee on 1 April 1980, which is a significant date when one considers what has happened since, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley)—little did he know that the great city that he has the honour to represent would be so hard hit by a system whose application he described as complicated—said:

"More dangerous than that are the circumstances in which I understand they are to be used . . . One problem is the very flexibility of the multiplier system. Flexibility is the Government's word, but flexibility, while it is beloved by Governments and civil servants, is a matter of which Parliament ought to be particularly wary. One man's flexibility is another man's capriciousness. If something can be used flexibly, it means that the Minister can use it in a variety of ways."

My right hon. Friend also said:

"They are crucial to the scheme and potentially damaging to some local authorities. They place in the hands of any Government arbitary powers".—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 1 April 1980; c. 1044-46.]

What prophetic words those turned out to be.

One of the problems for local authorities and Members of Parliament, and, above all, the public, is that the year-by-year application of multipliers has been different. We debated at length amendments to the Bill in which we argued for greater clarification of the local government finance system, which is getting more and more incomprehensible. Apart from a handful of experts who understand the system, for the rest of us confusion abounds. The Bill is about to make matters worse because of the Secretary of State's desire for an unnecessary and inordinate amount of discretion.

What was the main purpose of introducing multipliers in the first place? I ask that because they have been used on only two occasions for caps. The main intention was for safety net purposes, to ensure that local authorities did not lose a great deal of grant from one year to the next. "Complex" was the word used by the Minister in 1982 when discussing multipliers. That view was confirmed by the Audit Commission, which found that "it had in practice become so complex that many officers and members of local authorities had abandoned the attempt to understand it fully, while others had concentrated on features that could be exploited to the advantage of a particular authority."

My understanding of the situation is that Birmingham's case is not complicated. In Committee the Under-Secretary of State appeared to allege that Birmingham had made up the figure of £7·2 million. "Plucked out of the air" became the phrase bandied about in Committee. However, the mode of calculation of the £7·2 million was explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) when he said:

"Let me tell the hon. Lady now so that she can understand. The Secretary of State estimated a base grant of £158 million for 1985-86 using contrived assumptions, whereas in the Secretary of State's own projections the grant entitlement for 1985-86 was expected to be £165·2 million. The difference is £7·2 million and that is the amount that we are discussing".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 1 July 1986; c. 19.]

Birmingham is the only council to go to court, but many more councils are affected by the Government's decision. Thirty shire counties, 121 shire districts, eight metropolitan districts and one outer London borough are involved. The sum total involved is about £150 million, but only Birmingham has been to court. I understand that Nottingham wishes to go to court—but that is another matter.

This wretched Bill has been introduced because of the action of one local authority, and it involves £7·2 million which could and should have been found from the Department of the Environment's coffers. The entire £150 million could have been found from recycling grant cash.

The Government have used retrospective action on a number of occasions. The nature of retrospective action in this case causes concern to the Opposition. In the past in their dealings with local government this Government have changed the law relating to local authority mortgages. That was done by section 7 of the Local Government Act 1986. Section 91 of the Local Government Act 1985 makes unlawful payments by the GLC and metropolitan county councils to voluntary organisations and other local authorities after 24 July 1984. Section 8 of the Local Government (Finance) Act 1982 legalises the effective reduction in local authority block grant for those who have not complied with expenditure guidance issued previously by the Secretary of State in the 1981-82 financial year. In addition, the present Secretary of State for the Environment, while Secretary of State for Transport, legislated to overturn a decision by the courts in a case brought by the GLC involving payments to London Transport.

The clause is designed to override Mr. Justice Mann's decision in the Birmingham case. It will also prevent local authorities, which are considering the 1986-87 rate support grant order, from doing so. It also validates all previous block grant determinations.

There is sometimes a case for retrospective action by Parliament. I give but three examples — to correct an administrative oversight, to put right an administrative mistake, and to regularise wartime acts. Remedial retrospective action is normally unobjectionable. There is nothing unconstitutional about it, because Wade and Phillips in their book "Constitutional and Administrative Law" said:

"It follows from the supremacy of Parliament that Acts may have retrospective operation. But to change the character of past transactions carried out on the faith of the then existing law is repugnant to the conception of the rule of law."

In an article on retrospective legislation and the rule of law in Britain, J. W. Bridge said:

"It has been argued in this article that experience in Britain has shown that it is not desirable to prohibit retroactive legislation in all circumstances. Retrospective legislation may be used where justice demands it to protect persons from harm to themselves or their property where that harm results from an unforeseeable or unintended effect of the law or, as in the case of taxation, where different considerations apply. But apart from these exceptional and justifiable circumstances retrospective legislation does offend against the principles of the Rule of Law."

That might not be a relevant example, but the Government's retrospective action tonight certainly offends the people of Birmingham. They are being denied the product of spending £7·2 million which has been taken from them by the Secretary of State. Birmingham is in a region of growth in unemployment and could make good use of the money. We believe it essential to delete clause 1.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I shall speak more briefly than I had intended. I wish strongly to support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) and amendment No. 3, which would substitute a different figure for the multiplier used for the calculation of the rate support grant for Birmingham for this year.

During our discussion in Committee, it was established that from the time of the first announcement of the principles of this year's rate support grant a year ago, throughout the summer and the autumn environment Ministers discussed the basis of the RSG for this year with reference to last year's actual rate support grant. All local authorities thought that this year's RSGs would be based on the actual grants payable last year. That was the position throughout all the meetings and consultations with representatives of local authorities until the Secretary of State's announcement in December 1985.

What happened between the end of the consultations and that announcement, as became clear in Committee, was that some London authorities had made representations to the Secretary of State, who then changed his mind and based this year's RSGs not on the actual grants payable in 1985-86, but on what were called deemed grants — notional grants, artificial and contrived figures, dreamed up by the Secretary of State. I think that the word "dreamed" could be used instead of "deemed". That announcement came as a bolt from the blue to all local authorities.

For Birmingham, the difference between using the actual grant payable in 1985-86 and the deemed grant was £7·2 million. There is a tremendous feeling in the city of Birmingham about what has been called the robbery of £7·2 million. After protests to the Secretary of State, the city council decided to go to court. It is now well known that it won its case. A few days previously, the Secretary of State backed down and the Minister came to the House and told us that a Bill was being introduced. When the case came to court, the Government conceded the strength of Birmingham's case, and as a result an order was made in favour of Birmingham and the Department was ordered to pay the city's costs. The Secretary of State's representative in court admitted that the Secretary of State had acted illegally.

This Bill makes legal something that a court of law judged to be illegal. That is objectionable in any circumstances, but especially when it costs an individual or a group of people a large sum of money. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) may shake his head, but it was admitted in Committee—he was not there—that the effect of the Bill would be to make legal something that had been judged illegal and which the barrister representing the Secretary of State conceded was illegal. I am not questioning the good faith of Ministers; I accept what was said in Committee about their having taken a decision in good faith, being advised that they were wrong, conceding that and paying the city of Birmingham's costs. But this Bill takes away the fruits of that action; it means that Birmingham will not get £7·2 million.

We moved several amendments in Committee that would have given Birmingham the money that we regard as rightfully belonging to the city council. Amendment No. 3 would provide a means of giving Birmingham its £7·2 million, but in a different way. We tried to move amendments in Committee to persuade the Government to respect decisions made in a court of law on proceedings that had begun before the Bill was introduced into the House. That was not acceptable to the Government. We introduced other amendments that would have given the money to the city of Birmingham, but they were not acceptable either. I am not sure whether these amendments will be acceptable to the Government, but I suspect not. Amendment No. 3 would substitute for the existing multiplier used in the calculation of RSG for Birmingham —1·196046—a multiplier of 1·164156. The result would be straightforward—to give Birmingham its £7·2 million in RSG.

My hon. Friends and I came to the House this afternoon in a mood that relected the anger of the people of Birmingham, especially the city councillors, and prepared to discuss at length, through the night and the morning if necessary, the effects of the removal of £7·2 million from the city and to describe just what that means for our constituents——

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): And in detail.

Mr. Davis: Yes, in detail.

We have, however, received a letter from the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government telling us that ministerial note will be taken of the representations that we have made both in Committee and privately and that Ministers will give careful consideration to Birmingham's case for additional resources from the Department of the Environment's programmes during the current financial year. Leaking roofs are mended not by careful consideration, but by money. We do not not deal with the problem of Smith houses in Birmingham by considering it carefully. That problem, too, will be dealt with by money. There are many other examples where money is needed.

In the circumstances, I think that it would be unreasonable to press the Government further tonight. We expect the Minister to come forward with fresh money for Birmingham, and we shall accept that if it happens at short notice. My hon. Friends and I are prepared to accept the assurances that we have been given by the Minister on the basis on and the spirit in which he has given them. We expect, however, that his fine words will be matched by money. We shall not seek to delay unreasonably the passage of the Bill through Parliament tonight, but we expect the hon. Gentleman to respond by coming up with money in due course.

We are taking the Minister's word and putting ourselves in his hands. I have no question about his good faith, but we are suspicious, especially after what was said last year about the way in which rate support grant would be calculated for this year, when a change in the method of calculation cost Birmingham £7·2 million. There was naturally some suspicion among my Birmingham colleagues. As I have said, we are prepared to accept the assurances that we have received from the Minister this evening and we look forward to seeing fresh resources being made available to enable Birmingham city council to deal with the many problems that we have described briefly tonight and in detail in the past. I hope that it will not necessary to describe them in detail in future.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I am happy to take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). Satisfactory assurances may have been given to him and his hon. Friends, but they have not so far percolated through to the Government side of the Chamber. Nottingham Members — I include the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton), who is in his place —have not received the same assurances as those which have been given to Opposition Members who represent parts of Birmingham. Consequently, I feel obliged to pursue the issue, and I shall do so as briefly as possible.

Does the Bill, as drafted, have an effect on legal cases which have already been commenced? The hon. Member for Bassetlaw asked the same question in a different way and he will have reached his conclusion on the reply which he was given. I am looking to a reply from my hon. Friend the Minister to the question as I have posed it.

I seek to draw the attention of the House to the position in which Nottinghamshire finds itself as a result of the Bill and I am looking for an assurance from my hon. Friend the Minister on the effect that it will have on our county. Many Nottinghamshire Members are present, including the hon. Member for Bassetlaw.

Long before the Bill was published, Nottinghamshire county council commenced proceedings against my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The council claimed that the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87 was incorrectly established and calculated. Whether that is correct is not for me to say and not for the House to say. However, if a judge decides that the council is correct, Nottinghamshire ratepayers will be entitled to receive back from the Government about £18 million. I understand that the case is down for hearing before the Divisional court on 17 October. What is not clear from the Bill—nor was it clear from the Delphic reply of my hon. Friend the Minister to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw—is whether the council, by virtue of the Bill, is to be deprived of having its case determined by the courts. That is the long and the short of it. Has the Bill deprived my county council of its remedy through the courts? In my view, disputes should be settled in the courts—not by a side wind in a Bill dealing with another county council. I shall be glad to hear from my hon. Friend that my fears are ill-founded.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman's fears are not ill-founded. His fears are well-founded, because the Parliamentary Under-Secretary made it crystal clear at the end of her speech on new clause 1 that Nottingham could go to court, but it would have no remedy.

10.30 pm

Mr. Alexander: That is why I am pursuing the matter. My hon. Friend did not say in so many words that it would be unwise to go to court. She said that it could go to court. I do not claim that her reply was satisfactory. I think that Labour Members would be unwise to press me too far, because basically I am with them on that. I am trying to edge my hon. Friend into a more positive reply.

I appreciate that the Secretary of State must have some finality with a final date fixed for the calculation of the multiplier. Clarity and certainty are virtues in almost all fields. Delay might cause my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to alter the multiplier for other authorities in the same group, if the rules of the game had to be changed.

Nottinghamshire was entitled, as a matter of law, to use the law to challenge the proposed contribution it had to make to the further education pool as a result of the decision in the case involving the Inner London education authority. There is nothing else the county council could have done after that case than to go to law, if it believed that it was wrongly charged to that pool.

A successful appeal will reduce its budget and penalties. It is not fair if, as a result of the Bill, the council will not be allowed to proceed with its case — not because of anything that the county has done or any specific matter dealt with in the Bill, but because of something that occurred in a side wind as part of the Bill. That was not the reason for the Bill. I ask my hon. Friend to say that the Bill will not affect any remedy that a judge may decide the county council has.

I ask my hon. Friend for a specific assurance that my county council will not be deprived of its legal remedies by any side wind in the Bill. The Bill deals with something else. I ask my hon. Friend to assure me that there is nothing in the Bill to prevent my county council proceeding and, if found correct, proceeding to a satisfactory conclusion in the courts.

Mr. Ashton: I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander), but I think that he is rather optimistic. Asking the Government to change retrospective legislation is like asking for a reversal of the World Cup decision when Maradona knocked in the ball with his hand. The hon. Lady is on record as saying that, while the court case can be heard, whatever the outcome, there will be no recompense for Nottinghamshire.

In March this year, the county council commenced legal proceedings, because it felt that the case should be determined in the courts. It is now pressing for an exclusion clause to be inserted in the Bill which would protect the court proceedings. The Minister refuses to insert any sort of amendment or clause, or anything from the Labour party which says that the Minister is not above the court.

Before the legislation was introduced, Nottinghamshire had obtained leave from Mr. Justice Mann for a judicial review of decisions made by the Secretary of State. Clause 1 of the Bill, which has been approved, will retrospectively legitimise all the decisions of the Secretary of State under section 59 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act. As a result, Nottinghamshire county council will be denied an effective hearing in the courts, irrespective of the merits of the case. That is a form of dictatorship. We have often heard Governments allege that trade unions alter and backdate their rules, but the Government are doing exactly the same. It is wrong that the Bill, which, as the hon. Member for Newark said, was designed to alleviate Birmingham city council's problem, should now deny Nottinghamshire county council £18 million.

In February last year, Nottinghamshire county council fixed its budget for 1985-86 at £378 million. That was £8 million over target and the Government imposed a penalty of £18 million. The council knew that the penalty would be reduced if it cut spending. The budget included £16 million toward the cost of advanced further education. In June last year, ILEA successfully challenged in the High Court the basis on which the Secretary of State for Education and Science calculated contributions to the further education pool. By October, it was clear to the county council that its contributions would be reduced by about £1·6 billion only if it acted in the same way as ILEA. It therefore wrote to the Secretary of State saying that it proposed to cut its budget by the same amount, which would reduce the penalty.

In June, the council had revised its system of repaying loans for capital expenditure to spread it more evenly over the life of the loan. That brought Nottinghamshire into line with the majority of councils. It decided to charge to capital the salary costs of engineers working on new roads rather than pay them annually out of the rates. When those revisions were taken into account by the Department of the Environment, penalties would be reduced by £12 million.

During 1985, Nottinghamshire and Bradford sued the Secretary of State and were successful in the Court of Appeal but on 12 December 1985 lost in the House of Lords. I do not want to detain the House at this late stage with too many details, but the fact is that letters were sent and the Department of the Environment knew that Nottinghamshire county council was going to take that action. But still the council was ignored by the Department of the Environment. Because the council believed that the budget changes it proposed were legal and should be accepted, it wrote in October to the Department of the Environment, but the Department — probably deliberately — did not reply until 9 December. That letter, which was received on 11 December, stated two things. First, it said that the Secretary of State would not accept at that stage the advanced further education amendment because it was a windfall gain. The Secretary of State would have known that, if he accepted the amendment, it would increase the council's grant by £5 million. Secondly, to the council's surprise, the letter said that if there were any other budget changes, the Secretary of State would take them into account, provided they were received in time. An under-secretary confirmed by telephone that any other changes would be acceptable but he gave no indication that it was already too late because the rate support grant report was with the printers and had been signed that very day. The following morning, 12 December, at 10 am the council telexed all the budget revisions and the Department of the Environment acknowledged receipt at 11 am.

Nottinghamshire county council's case was based on the fact that it had altered its budget in time. The Secretary of State refused to accept that, although he is obliged by virtue of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to use the best information available when making supplementary reports. Nottinghamshire's case is that he failed to use the information given to him about its budget and that he was told in time.

This dispute can obviously be settled only by the courts. The House cannot settle it. Legal evidence must be produced as to whether the county council was within the time scale and was doing exactly the same as ILEA — action of which the court had approved. It is common justice that the council's case should still be heard in the courts. The case is down for hearing in the middle of October. But the Under-Secretary of State says that it does not matter a damn what the court decides in October. The court can provide the remedy and say that Nottinghamshire county council was in order in everything that it did, but the Bill rules that out and any saving or amendment to the council's budget does not matter.

This is a constitutional issue. It is not about cash any more. It is about law and order. The party of law and order is quick to amend the law when it looks as though it might cost it some cash or as though it does not fall within the range of what it sees as being in order.

This is a panic Bill, although not too much of a panic because the Government know its effects. They know that the Minister has been acting illegally for about five or six years and has now been found out.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): They confessed.

Mr. Ashton: Exactly. The only way of covering their tracks and of saving a great deal of money at the same time is by amending the rules. They have changed the rules and moved the goal posts in the middle of the game. They are a Government of cheats if they do not allow the court to decide whether the Nottinghamshire application was made in the right place, at the right time and in a bona fide manner. Nottingham's ratepayers should not be denied £18 million because of something that has happened in Birmingham under totally different circumstances.

I hope that the Minister will give an assurance that if the courts find that Nottinghamshire county council has a justifiable case and should have received that £18 million, it will be given next year. Better still, the council should be notified of that fact very quickly so that it does not have to go to court.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): I support both hon. Members who have just spoken, although not the florid language of the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) and his suggestion that my right hon. Friend was cheating. One principal point overrides all others. The Nottinghamshire county council went to court, as did the Secretary of State. The court found against the Secretary of State's evidence that it could hear the action. That is the most important point. The Secretary of State gave evidence that this Bill would render the action unnecessary, but the court found that it should hear the case. In those circumstances, it is repugnant that the Bill should take away the remedy of that action.

I know that other hon. Members representing Nottinghamshire do not intend to speak, because of the time available, but I am sure they would agree that retrospective legislation in that form is totally unacceptable. It will create a precedent. If Opposition Members ever tried to do the same thing, Conservatives would be deeply offended. I would be equally offended if my right hon. Friend tried to do same thing.

Mr. Rooker: Like my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), I shall be much briefer than I had intended. The phrase that the Minister used in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) is almost on a par with the reply of the Home Secretary during the Second Reading of the Shops Bill. He was asked whether there would be a guillotine, and, almost without thinking, he said that there would not. That had major repercussions.

I do not know whether the hon. Lady read her answer on advice from the civil servants' Box or whether she thought about what she was saying. But her answer clearly applied specifically to the Nottinghamshire case, of which I know nothing, although I have learnt a lot in the last few minutes.

Nottinghamshire county council is bound to get advice from the comptroller saying, "You cannot go to court now because the Minister has already said in Parliament that no judge can give you a remedy. Therefore, the costs of going to court would be a misuse of public funds." Nottinghamshire is therefore placed in an impossible position.

Unlike Birmingham, hon. Members from Nottinghamshire on both sides of the House are prepared to get up off their backsides and speak up for their authority. That has not happened in respect of Birmingham, which has not been an all-party exercise. I also freely admit that I was out of the country during Second Reading, hence my absence from the Division lists on that night. But this affair has not been handled in the spirit in which things have operated in the past. Previously, when our local authority has been badly treated by central Government, we have operated in a more constructive manner than on this occasion. The lessons of Nottinghamshire can be taken on board in Birmingham.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern to have all-party support in Birmingham for the action on the repayment of the £7·2 million. Conservative Members have given many reasons why it is difficult for the Government to accept that, but it is equally difficult for many Conservative Members, especially those who represent Birmingham constituencies, to go along with the hon. Gentleman's view that the Government have stolen £7·2 million from Birmingham ratepayers when we have just heard that the local authority has taken £31 million more from the ratepayers than it needed.

Mr. Rooker: I welcome that intervention, because it means I can deal with two points which I would not otherwise have raised. The hon. Gentleman did not know that when he refused to support the repayment of the £7 million.

Whether the sum should be £7 million may or may not be justified in the Government's mind. Therefore, I welcome the Minister's letter and take it on trust, as, indeed, we all do. I shall spell out what I expect of the Minister, following that letter. I do not know what representations Conservative Members for Birmingham have made. They do not seem to want any of the £7 million returned because they find it too difficult to organise. I do not know whether they have asked for the money in another form, because there are other ways of assisting Birmingham quite legitimately and separately from other local authorities. There need not be a knock-on effect. We are making a special case for Birmingham, and we shall show, by highlighting certain factors, that there is a special case to be made.

Members of Parliament do not often have the opportunity to set priorities for local authority budgets. It is not our function. Most constituents think that we are in charge of local government budget priorities, but we must frequently disabuse them of that. Given the Minister's letter and given that there is some concession coming, it behoves us to say what our priorities are. The Minister knows that, despite what has happened recently, Birmingham is still by and large a low spending and low rate authority compared with many other large cities. Housing policy is not given sufficient priority in Birmingham compared with other projects. Tonight I have an opportunity on behalf of my constituents to try to influence the priorities on spending in Birmingham. I have no control over that and I do not wish to have any, because it is a matter for my colleagues on the city council. But tonight there is a chance of influencing how the Minister repays some or all of the money to Birmingham. Clearly, he will not accept the amendment.

The Minister should listen to what is said in the House as well as what is said in the City. No one would deny that the first priority of the chief executive of the city council is to get that £9 million urban development grant, but whether it should be used for a five-star hotel is another matter. I would argue that there are other priorities. The Minister has turned the application down. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short, will undoubtedly make the point with more force than I can because it affects her constituency. A five-star hotel would not be my priority and it should not be the city's priority either.

Even in housing there are arguments about where the money should be spent. My view is that it should be targeted. The Minister's letter refers to programmes during the current financial year. Therefore, we are referring to something that has not been budgeted for. If the Government were to say, "We have decided to provide compensation amounting to £X million to overcome these difficulties, but we cannot do it by means of the multiplier; we will do it in another way, and here is the money," that would not be satisfactory. I want the money to be targeted on housing.

Money should be allocated specifically to compensate for the cuts caused by the lack of home improvement grants. Money should also be allocated to remedy housing defects. To its credit, Birmingham, as the largest public housing landlord, has taken the lead among English local authorities in surveying defective housing and estimating the costs of repair. It has discovered that the Smith, Parkinson and Boot houses cannot be repaired within the financial limits set by the Government. In some cases the repairs would cost far more than the market value of the houses. Therefore, Birmingham has said that it will repurchase the houses, with a view to future demolition.

The Minister ought to consider providing additional financial assistance for Birmingham under the Housing Defects Act 1984. A sum of £4 million would not be amiss. We are already a quarter of the way through this financial year. We could cope with additional expenditure of that order before 31 March 1987. It would not solve all the problems. The expenditure would be much higher than that. However, it would release other money for repairs and improvements.

To channel the money to housing defects would solve two problems. First, people are living in homes that are an albatross round their necks. They bought their homes in good faith, but they are now unable to sell them. Buyers cannot obtain a mortgage and the houses cannot be repaired within the financial limits. Secondly, money would be released for repairs to the council's housing stock.

Ministers are not unaware of these suggestions. On 19 May the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction received an all-party delegation from the council. However, the delegation contained only Labour Members of Parliament because the Tory Members refused to attend the meeting. The Minister received a presentation of Birmingham's difficulties in operating the Housing Defects Act. We have not yet received the Minister's reply to that presentation. We were told that he would reply first to me and to my hon. Friends.

Birmingham faces special problems over the working of the Housing Defects Act. We know that £7 million more has been taken than should have been taken. In addition, there has been the catastrophic loss of rate support grant during the last few years. A case can be made for special additional funding under the Housing Defects Act in the current financial year. It would meet the commitment that is contained in the Minister's letter.

The Minister has also been pressed to disregard the special expenditure that is incurred by Birmingham's bid to host the 1992 Olympic games. There is no disagreement between the parties in Birmingham over that. Business has been a little slow to appreciate the seriousness of Birmingham's claim. Birmingham has committed an enormous amount of money to this bid. If the bid is successful,, it will do a great deal of good not just to Birminhgam but to the nation as a whole.

Additional expenditure has also been incurred because of the Handsworth riots on 9 and 10 September. The operation of the Riot (Damages) Act is a thundering disgrace, and it should not form any part of modern public administration. We need to look at this quickly, although that will not help my constituents, or those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) or of my hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood, whose constituencies are also affected. A special disregard should be made for Birmingham because of its unique problems.

The Minister can find other ways to help. If he cannot find the full £7 million, I am prepared to take half a loaf. I can see from his letter that half a loaf is available. Unfortunately, this has not been done on an all-party basis.

I must respond to the point made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King). It is a matter of some concern to any hon. Member if his constituents have been either over-rated or over-taxed. Birmingham has a revenue expenditure of about £900 million, give or take a few million, and deals with enormous sums of capital flow. The headlines last week were that we were £31 million overcharged on the rates, which is ludicrous, when there was a 43 per cent. rates increase last year. As I understand it, the £31 million was £23 million if one takes account of the £8 million deficit brought forward from 1984-85, which was the deficit that the Tory Councillor Bosworth left when he was thrown out of office.

There was a projected balance of £21 million when the budget was announced. The chamber of commerce was told about this in all the documents — there was no secret about this. There have been some technical changes in the way in which the Government have made their calculations. When one takes into account the balances that were robbed by the Tories so that they could cut the rates — a move for which they lost office — leaving a deficit that we had to make good, and the cuts in the rate support grant of £11 million over 1985-86, that leaves us with about £15 million. We are told that that is not an awful lot for a city that is spending £900 million. I do not see why there should be any balances anyway. The cash flows each week in Birmingham are enormous. The final figure is nowhere near the £31 million first quoted by the hon. Member for Northfield and he can get the information as easily as I and my hon. Friends.

I accept the Minister's word that something will happen. I have given my view as to where the money should be targeted, and why. I am not in favour of the money simply being made available after the budget has been met. because there are factors and projects on which nmoney will be spent of which I do not approve. They do not figure in my priorities and they would not assist my constituents. I am here to represent my constituents, not the organisations of local authorities.

Ms. Clare Short: I, too, will be brief—much briefer than I had intended to be if we had not received this generous letter from the Minister. I am sure that we are all extremely grateful and expect great things as he fulfils his undertaking to find some extra money for Birmingham to make up for taking away £7·2 million — an undertaking given because the Government took legal advice that showed that Birmingham would win in the courts.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), I wish to put on record my priorities for how the money should be spent. The Minister is right, if Saturday's Birmingham Post is correct, in rebuffing the request for a £9 million urban development grant for a luxury hotel to be built right next to one of the most appalling estates in my constituency, where people are living in tower blocks and maisonettes, with water and black mould affecting the health and the lungs of their children, according to consultants at the Birmingham's children's hospital, which is in the same area. It is a declining and dreadful estate, with no community facilities or proper cleaning. The lifts are used in those revolting ways that we have heard about in high-rise tower blocks that are in decline. I appeal to the Minister to make some money available for refurbishing that estate, and to confirm that the money will not be used to build a luxury hotel across the road.

The Minister will be aware that the Paymaster General made great play of a commitment to ensure that urban renewal work and so on would employ local people in the area of the Handsworth riots, which affected Ladywood, and the constituencies of my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr and of my right hon. Friend the Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell). That was an important undertaking, because in the past, as we all know, much of the money spent in Handsworth has not employed local people, yet our rate of youth unemployment is horrendously high. More than 90 per cent. of very young black people are unemployed, and they provide the majority of those seeking work in the area. Despite that undertaking from the Paymaster General there is no money for urban renewal, and so there will only be a few jobs. It is a good policy, but it is too late. The money has been spent, and no new money is flowing through. Consequently, there will not be many jobs for local young people.

Another priority is urban renewal for the remaining parts of my constituency. A number of privately owned houses are in a dreadful state of disrepair. Many people are unemployed and can no longer afford to maintain their houses. Thousands of unemployed young people would give their right arm to obtain a job, to earn some money and to build up their local community. When the Minister decides how the money is to be spent, I hope that it will be spent not on subsidising luxury hotels to be erected by enormously wealthy international companies, but on improving the sad and declining estate in my area, on the urban renewal needs of Birmingham, and on helping young black people in Handsworth to find employment in their community.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): In every sense of the phrase, this is a squalid Bill at the end of a wholly squalid affair. The city of Birmingham council went to court because it had a grievance. It was not simply a matter of the council arguing its case before the court, because the Government's representatives confessed in court that the Secretary of State had acted illegally. That guilt was confirmed by the court—it had little choice—and costs were awarded to the city of Birmingham. Having confessed to that illegality, the Government then obtained the support of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) in this form of legalised robbery.

Earlier we debated the fight against crime. It is quite bizarre that the Government's proposals should almost amount to knighting and honouring every burglar, mugger and rapist among those who carry out the 3·6 million crimes a year. If they had the power that the Secretary of State has or the votes that are behind him, they would go to court and get their convictions altered.

In practice, this argument should not be allowed to concentrate on the mind-bending detail of multipliers, rate support grants, GREs and so on. We are arguing about whether the city of Birmingham should be allowed to spend the money that it said that it needed to spend prudently and sensibly, on behalf of a modern regional city that is trying to work its way out of a recession. The debate is not only narrowly about Birmingham. As the largest English authority that body went to court. We are talking about the effect, seven years on, of this Government's continuing war against the right of locally elected councils to decide sensibly and prudently on their priorities and spending. That is what it is all about. Whitehall does not know best. Heaven knows how many times that has been said in the House and it is still not listened to, understood or respected.

It is not as if the city of Birmingham is a big spender: I wish that it were. I take no pride in saying, and I know that some of my hon. Friends take no pride in it either, that in 1985-86 the city spent 6 per cent. below the Government spending targets. One of the problems in Birmingham is that it has consistently and persistently, under successive regimes, seen its role as that of a low spender. The penny is now beginning to drop and we hope that it will complete the fall under the Labour council and show that that great city will never solve its problems as long as it takes this too modest approach. I am not talking about being profligate. The Secretary of State visited Birmingham last September, on a visit of Handsworth, and he congratulated the city fathers on the way in which, in the previous two or three years they had spent money.

Like my hon. Friends I do not want any money that will flow from the Secretary of State's letter to go into some unspecified pot. I stress, along with my hon. Friends from the city, the paramount importance of finding more ways of getting money into housing. There is no bigger crisis in our city and the Government need no lectures on that. We do not waste money and I am not knocking the bid for the Olympic Games which Birmingham is carrying on Britain's behalf. All of us who run regular surgeries in the city know about the way in which the misery has built up in people who live in inadequate housing and who cannot get a transfer or repairs and have no real hope on the waiting list.

I remind Ministers, in case he think we are messing about on this subject, that the last comprehensive return entitled "Repair and Improvement of the Local Authority Housing Stock", RILAHS for short, was sent to the Department of the Environment at the Department's request. That return identified the need to spend in excess of—wait for it:

"£715 million on repairing and improving the Council's existing stock."

That is not on one new build because there is not one new family house of flat or purpose-built property for the disabled included in that amount. That £715 million is to repair the wreckage that we have in housing at the moment. The statement was reported to the council meeting on 1 July from the housing committee and said:

"an additional 635 new rented dwellings need to be provided by the City and a similar number by housing associations each year for the next five years."

That is a total of 1,270 houses per year. I do not know how the hon. Member for Northfield can vote for this robbery when we have such housing needs, some of them in his own constituency. I do not understand how he can do that.

Mr. Roger King rose——

Mr. Corbett: I know that his constituents will not understand it either. I gladly give way.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman has just given us ample evidence, if any were needed, of how disastrous it is for any city to get into such a situation with its council housing. In many ways it is a condemnation of the principle council housing, because there are plenty of alternative ways in which we could have developed housing within the city. He seems desperately concerned about this £7 million, but what about the £22 million left over from last year or the £15 million? That is over expenditure that was not budgeted for: it is excess profit for the council.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Gentleman just does not understand. He continues to troop through the Lobby to vote for a Government who say, on the back of the right-to-buy policy, that local authorities cannot even spend the bulk of the money that they raise from that process on replacing, repairing, modernising or improving housing in the city. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He must live with that for which he voted. He voted for this £7·2 million robbery, just as he voted to put the lid on councils spending the revenue which they obtain from selling their houses. He cannot have it both ways; the voters will see through him.

I must make a narrow constituency point. On the Lyndhurst estate in my constituency, about £1·5 million is being spent on six tower blocks because they are falling down. Exterior work must be carried out on safety grounds. In an ideal world, those tenants would be invited to move out while the work is being carried out, because it is noisy, it is a nuisance and it causes disturbance, dust and dirt. Many of the tenants have lived in those blocks since they were built; they are elderly and have mobility problems. Since the hon. Member for Northfield voted for the robbery by the Government of funds that Birmingham would have otherwise spent on housing, tenants in three of the blocks on which work has started are fenced in by plastic. There is scaffolding all over the blocks, and jack hammers and sledgehammers are banging all over the walls. Even those with the most severe medical problems will be lucky to be moved out while the work is carried on. The hon. Member for Northfield cannot justify stealing £7·2 million that could have been used to give those tenants some sanity and peace while the necessary work was done.

The Minister believes that Birmingham has run out of work. Let me tell him about 1,500 Boswell houses in my constituency. They were built in the 1920s, are shale-filled and have major suspected structural problems. We are not inventing those problems. Four hundred of those homes —I do not complain about this—have been bought by their former council tenants. They have spent much money putting in bay windows, changing the front doors and all the other things that people do when they buy. I do not knock them at all. There is a major problem there. Money must be spent to put that problem right.

If Ministers cannot yet understand why we from the city of Birmingham feel so strongly about this robbery, will they at least think about what happens to real people in real streets in all our constituencies, including Northfield? This is the reality of what spending is about. That is why we object so strongly to this legalised robbery and—I say this to the Minister flatly—that is why we attach supreme importance to the word that he used in the letter that he wrote today to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis).

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): One problem, but also a pleasure, of being the Minister responsible for local government is that, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, the complicated multipliers and formulae deal with real places and real people. Therefore, it is logically possible to extend such debates, which deal with all the authorities in the country, almost endlessly. I am grateful for the fact that the hon. Members who represent Birmingham and Nottinghamshire put succintly their strong cases on the way in which the legislation, as they see it, affects their local authorities.

The amendments go to the heart of the Bill. The justification, approval for which we asked on Second Reading and which we received from the House, was that we needed to validate retrospectively the way in which the law had been thought to have worked to give us and local authorities the certainty that the law meant what we had thought.

I well understand that there will be losers among local authorities, just as there will be gainers, unless we as a Government relax the cash limits on local authority spending. It is legitimate for Opposition Members with a different view of economic policy to urge that, but as a Minister it is also legitimate for me to ask my hon. Friends to reject that.

There would have been no way to validate the law as we thought it to be for the losers and to put money in without abandoning our policy. That is why I must ask my hon. Friends, even though some represent authorities which in some respects are losers and would have gained from the immediate change that resulted from the court case brought by Birmingham, to reject the amendment.

The same is true of the Nottinghamshire case. There is no magic about the Nottinghamshire case either. The Department has written to Nottinghamshire saying that we shall, on the same grounds as the Birmingham case, concede their case. It is entirely up to Nottinghamshire whether it continues with the court case. I understand that it is uncomfortable for hon. Members, but we have had to say that the basis of the law must be returned to what we all thought it was.

I well understand that the legal challenges do not come from the fact that Nottinghamshire or Birmingham suddenly have, for general prima facie reasons, a sudden interest in the law. It is because they want to spend more money and have more money from the Government.

Mr. Ashton: The Minister has made a concrete cash offer to Birmingham, or at least has said that he will look at things favourably. Is he now saying that he will do the same for Nottinghamshire and that it will receive some financial benefit if he has the chance to look at the matter?

Mr. Waldegrave: There have been a number of debates. There has been a debate about the principles of validating what we thought the law meant, and I have no shame at all in coming to the House and saying—my right hon. Friend the Member for Wansted and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) put it well on Second Reading — that Governments have a perfect right to secure that the law means what everyone thought it meant and for which they have all worked. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) and others need have no doubt that that is a legitimate thing for Governments to do.

There has been another debate during the course of the Bill, which may be accidental in the sense that Birmingham brought the case, but it has fluently and persuasively focussed on some of the Birmingham problems. Hon. Members who represent Birmingham have justifiably used the Bill to press a number of cases on behalf of Birmingham, which they have also made outside the context of the Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) or the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) was generous enough to make concession over Conservative councillors. Indeed, I have found that in dealings with Councillor Knowles and his predecessor, Councillor Bosworth, that they come from a city, as mine used to be, where the local people put the city first and work together, which must be a strength for Birmingham.

During debates on the Bill several issues have been brought to my attention and some have been mentioned tonight. They show, as is bound to be the case, that there are different priorities, even among Labour groups in Birmingham. The Hyatt hotel does not seem to be popular among those hon. Members who have spoken tonight, although the hon. Member for Perry Barr, who is a sensible man, will, I am sure, say that if private money comes forward he will have no objection to that.

A number of other points have been made. The issue does not depend on the Bill, but on the way in which powerful representations from Birmingham have been hung upon it. Powerful delegations have talked to us. We are looking at the mechanisms available to us which might meet some of the problems. Of course it is open to my hon. Friends who represent Nottinghamshire constituencies to come to see me. However, I shall not be influenced by a case made on the Bill. They must make a case on merit, as other authorities do when they see us.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): Did my hon. Friend say in response to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) that the answer was no?

Mr. Waldegrave: I said that I could not possibly say to Nottinghamshire or to Birmingham that because they happened to be losers under the Bill, and because the multipliers mean what we all believe them to mean, they have any right to additional resources. A case has been made which we shall attempt to meet. The sum of £700 million was mentioned. I do not think that we are talking about such a sum, but we shall see whether resources can be found to meet some of the purposes put to us.

Mr. Alexander: In view of what my hon. Friend has just said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) what does he mean when he says that the Government will concede the case? Will Nottinghamshire get the money, or not?

Mr. Waldegrave: The situation is exactly the same as that for Birmingham and for the other authorities which produced late information. There is a strong case for saying that it must be for the Secretary of State to set a date beyond which information cannot be handled. Other authorities also produced late budgets. A telexed budget was handed to the Secretary of State as he entered the Chamber. That is an impossible way to proceed. We have the right to set a cut-off date for information. That is fair.

We are talking about a central part of a Bill which validates procedures which we all agreed were valid in the first instance. The county case, which we have conceded, is put right and validated in the Bill.

I have made points quite clearly to hon. Members representing Birmingham and councillors from both parties who have been to see us. I have to disappoint my hon. Friends who represent Nottinghamshire constituencies by saying that they and other councils will lose under the Bill. They cannot seek money from the Government, but if they want to make a case on merit, we shall be delighted to see them.

Mr. Boyes: I have listened with care to comments by my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). They put the case with passion for the people who live in Birmingham. We talk about councils and large sums, but at the end of the day we care about the citizen.

Even taking into consideration comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) about the Nottinghamshire county council case, I do not intend to press amendment No. 3 to a Division, but after listening to the Minister and his disappointing reply to many important issues, I shall ask my hon. Friends to divide the House on amendment No. 1.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 171, Noes 230.

Clause 2

ADJUSTMENT OF BLOCK GRANT TO LIMIT EFFECTS OF CHANGES 1982 C. 32.

Mr. Straw: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 16, leave out from first 'section' to end of line 17.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendment: No. 9, in page 2, line 7, leave out from 'desirable' to end of line 14 and insert—

'( ) The Secretary of State shall not exercise the power for the purpose mentioned in subsection (2) above so as to decrease the amount of block grant payable to a local authority unless he is satisfied that it is necessary to do so in order to prevent—

(a) the difference in question having an unreasonable effect on the way in which block grant for that year is distributed; and

(b) an unreasonable increase in the amount of block grant payable to that authority for that year compared to the amount payable to them for the previous year;'.

No. 10, in page 2, line 7, leave out from 'desirable' to end of line 14.

No. 11, in page 2, line 18, at end insert

'subject to section 8(3)(a) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982'.

No. 15, in schedule 1, page 4, line 5, leave out

'paragraph (a) shall be omitted'

and insert

'for the words "in paragraph (a) of subsection (6) of that section" there shall be substituted the words

'subsection (2) of section 2 of the Rate Support Grant Act 1986"'.

Mr. Straw: Amendment No. 9, the operative amendment, seeks to change the criteria under which block grants might be capped. Section 8(3)(a) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 deals with caps. The section provides that powers conferred by section 59 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 shall not be exercised for the purpose specified in subsection (6)(a) of the 1980 Act

"so as to decrease the amount of block grant payable to a local authority unless the Secretary of State is satisfied that there will be an unreasonable increase, unless he exercises the power, in the amount of block grant payable to that authority for a year compared with the amount payable to them for the previous year".

The Bill seeks to change the test for caps from the effect on individual authorities that have received, on the face of it, a large amount of additional block grant, to the effect on other authorities. Clause 2(3) of the Bill provides that the Secretary of State

"shall not exercise the power for that purpose so as to decrease the amount of block grant payable to a local authority for any year unless he is satisfied that it is necessary to do so in order to prevent the difference in question having an unreasonable effect on the way in which block grant for that year is distributed or on the contribution made or to be made by ratepayers in that year to the expenditure of local authorities."

There is a major friction between the test under the present law and the test under the Bill.

The Committee sought an explanation from Ministers as to how the new power would operate. We asked whether it was possible, under the proposed powers, for an authority to have its block grant otherwise payable capped where it could be said that the amount that the authority was to receive was unreasonable, but where it could not be said that the amount was unreasonable for all other authorities, or that it would have an unreasonable effect on all other authorities. I was confused by the answers. When we considered the matter on 10 July, the Minister sought to explain it. However, the hon. Lady left me even more confused. She said:

"Last year"—

I assume that that is an error in the record, because she meant 1982—

"section 8(3) (a) of the Local Government Act 1985 provided the Secretary of State with powers to cut"—

it should say "cap"—

"gain where there was an unreasonable effect on one authority alone, but that power was not used last year, or even interpreted that way, and the action we took in relation to Birmingham concerns the power we now propose in clause 2(2)—the ability to tap"—

it should be "cap"—

"The authority's gain because of the unreasonable effect on the settlement to all other local authorities and all ratepayers."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 10 July 1986; c. 120.]

I invite the Under-Secretary of State to explain what she meant. She seemed to suggest that the power under section 8(3) (a) was not used last year in relation to the matters about which Birmingham complained. If that section is not in contention, why have we wasted so much of our time in the past few months seeking to amend it? My understanding was that section 8(3) (a) was a pertinent part of Birmingham's objection to the way in which Ministers made decisions.

Is the Under-Secretary of State saying that capping could not be introduced where the only objection to the amount of grant received by an authority was that it could be regarded as an unreasonable imposition on that authority but could not be regarded as such an imposition on every other authority?

Mrs. Rumbold: I shall try to clarify the matter that we discussed in Committee. As the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, the amendments deal with a restriction on the power of the Secretary of State to cap grant gains by applying multipliers which reduce the grant. The existing provision requires the Secretary of State to satisfy himself that there would be an unreasonable increase in an authority's grant for one year compared with the previous year if he did not apply a cap. The amendments suffer from the same flaw with respect to the general powers of multipliers as was disclosed in the Birmingham case. This requires the Secretary of State to look at the overall change in grant. The amendments would simply incorporate the same flaw in the new legislation. I include amendment No. 9, which is a sort of hybrid between the existing provision and the one in the Bill.

In the Bill, as drafted, there is a new requirement that the Secretary of State should not apply caps

"unless he is satisfied that it is necessary to do so in order to prevent . . . an unreasonable effect on the way in which block grant for that year is distributed".

The use of caps is to prevent large gains by some authorities, reducing the pool available to all authorities. That is a seridus, sensible and proper constraint on the power of the Secretary of State to cap gains. I hope that the House will agree that that is the effect of the new power that the Secretary of State will be given under the Bill as opposed to the old power which will be subsumed by the new legislation.

Schedule 1

Amendments

Mr. Straw: I beg to move, amendment No. 16, in page 4, line 21, leave out paragraphs 8 and 9.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 17, in page 4, line 24, leave out from 'words' to end of line 25 and insert 'the reasons for making'.

No. 18, in page 4, line 24, leave out from 'words' to end of line 26 and insert

'the material consideration leading the Secretary of State to make any such determination'.

No. 19, in page 4, line 27, leave out from 'words' to end of line 29 and insert

'the material consideration leading to them'.

No. 20, in page 4, line 28, leave out from 'words' to end of line 29 and insert

'the reasons for making them'.

No. 21, in page 4, line 32, leave out from 'words' to second 'the' in line 33 and insert 'the reasons for making'.

No. 22, in page 4, line 32, leave out from 'words' to end of line 34 and insert

'the material considerations leading the Secretary of State to make the determination'.

No. 32, in page 5, line 47, at end insert—

'14.—(1) Section 56 of the said Act of 1980 shall be amended as follows:

(2) After subsection (10) there shall be inserted—

"(10A) If representations are made to the Secretary of State by any association of local authorities or by any local authority that the total expenditure of local authorities generally or of any particular local authority shall be adjusted by the addition or subtraction of expenditure of any description the Secretary of State shall consider those representations before determining whether or not to make a direction and shall give reasons for his decision."'.

Mr. Straw: Amendment No. 16 proposes that paragraphs 8 and 9 of schedule 1 should be left out. When, earlier today, I made a submission to Mr. Speaker about the possibility that a certificate might be made classifying this Bill as a money Bill, I drew particular attention to paragraphs 8, 9 and 13. I hoped to show Mr. Speaker that this Bill is about much more than the variation of charges out of moneys voted by Parliament.

Paragraphs 8, 9 and 13 are not subordinate issues but go to the heart of the relationship between central and local government in relation to financial matters. They relate to the explanations that Secretaries of State are to be required to give for the decisions that they have made in relation to various determinations under the rate support grant legislation.

We discussed this aspect of the Bill at some length in Committee. The Minister's anxiety is that the existing words, which require him to spell out the considerations that lead the Secretary of State to make any such determination, are so wide that he might be tripped up in court when he had inadvertently failed to specify such considerations. I think the Minister accepted that no such attempts had so far been made to go to court under section 60(6)(b) of the 1980 Act. Therefore, this anticipated the possibility of a legal assault rather than dealing with one that had already taken place.

Our objection to paragraphs 8 and 9 is that they remove a clear duty under the 1980 Act and substitute a wholly subjective discretion. Instead of the Secretary of State giving the considerations that led him to make the determination, there is a discretion to provide such explanations as he "thinks desirable of the main features of any such determination".

That could mean anything or nothing.

The Minister said that he and his hon. Friends were reasonable people, and we are told ad nauseum on account of Wednesbury that that goes without saying. He said that as reasonable people they would provide as much information as possible—indeed, that we would not be able to spot the join between the application of the present provisions and the new provisions.

Two points arise. First, if we are unable to spot the join between the old regime and the new one, why make the change at all? Secondly, while this Minister may be very reasonable, he may at some stage be elevated to an even higher position——

Mr. Terry Davis: A peerage.

Mr. Straw: That awaits him in any event, but as the roulette wheel has turned, half the Cabinet has been in office for less than a year. Therefore, it is short odds against, if not odds on, that the Minister may find himself in the Cabinet. However, he will not be there for ever, and who knows how another Secretary of State may interpret these words. Secretaries of State do not have to take account of explanations offered in this House, and they cannot be the subject of court actions. As we well know, only the words on the face of Acts can be tested in the courts, and paragraph 8 waters down an existing and important duty.

When we debated this in Committee, I sought to meet the Minister half way by accepting that the words "the considerations" might have been slightly infelicitously drafted. The Minister feared that everything would have to be put in the pot, including the reason why he had a go at Birmingham, which may have been because he had a bad breakfast. To meet the half genuine point of the Minister, I suggested that "consideration" should be qualified by "material" so that we would deal with the main considerations leading to the determination. The Minister said:

"I shall study closely what he has said, but that undertaking carries with it the lowest level of moral commitment to introducing an amendment." — [Official Report, Standing Committee G, 15 July 1986; c. 164.]

We may be denied the possibility of pursuing this, even in the other place, if the Bill is certified as a money Bill, which I hope it is not. I understand, but do not accept, the Minister's argument that the wording is too wide. Certainly, the new wording is too narrow and will give Ministers too substantial a discretion. I hope that the Minister will accept the amendment which incorporates "material" as a qualification. That would meet the Government's concern that they should not have to specify every tiny consideration, but merely the main ones.

The courts are capable of applying common sense in this case. They are not expected to produce tomes the size of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, merely an adequate explanation of the reasons for Ministers' decisions. If local government is to be convinced that there is a systematic approach to the amounts of block grant they receive and that decisions are not based on caprice, it is crucial that it can satisfy itself how decisions are made. The Minister knows well—he is sensitive about this—that relations between central and local government have taken more than one knock over the past five years. He is anxious to restore them, but he will not do so if he seeks to deny local authorities adequate information about how decisions are made.

Amendment No. 32 seeks to amend section 56 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980. It states:

"If representations are made to the Secretary of State by any association of local authorities or by any local authority that the total expenditure of local authorities generally or of any particular local authority shall be adjusted by the addition or subtraction of expenditure of any description the Secretary of State shall consider those representations before determining whether or not to make a direction and shall give reasons for his decision."

The amendment seeks to require the Secretary of State to consider requests from local authorities to amend the definition of total expenditure for block grant purposes and to give his reasons for granting or not granting such requests. In previous debates we considered the operation of targets and I moved new clause 1 to remove the power to establish targets under the 1982 legislation. Targets have now been abandoned for the time being and we do not lament their passing. But of the facilities that went with targets was the Secretary of State's opportunity to disregard certain items of expenditure when comparing an authority's expenditure with its target. That was an important safety valve of the target mechanism and enabled certain classes of expenditure which everyone accepted were essential not to suffer penalty.

Under the so-called pure block grant arrangements, a similar mechanism is not provided for disregards, but that would be all right provided that the penalty system was abandoned altogether. Although targets were abolished, the penalty system continues, with changes in the slope of the schedules, which means that authorities will still suffer considerable financial penalties if they spend over their grant-related expenditure assessment, plus tolerance. The abolition of the target mechanism and, with it the disregards, mean that a number of expenditures that would have been disregarded for target purposes and that would not have suffered penalty under that system will place some authorities in a more difficult position than would otherwise have been the case.

As examples of the cost to ratepayers of various disregards, in 1985-86 Lambeth paid £1·36 for every £1 of expenditure. In 1986-87, based upon provisional exemplifications of the settlement, with package A GREAs, the extra cost to Lambeth will be £2·17. In 1985-86, for every £1 of additional spending the cost to Birmingham was £1·09. In 1986-87 it will cost Birmingham £2·60. Most reprehensible of all is Lancashire. For every £1 of additional spending last year it was only having to pay 72p. This year it is having to find £1·24.

A paper was published by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, supported by the London Boroughs Association, the Association of Local Authorities and the Greater London Council, in an effort to seek a way out of this problem. It is important that the Minister should make observations upon that paper.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I support the amendments. The Minister will remember that in Committee it was strongly argued that the local authority associations would appreciate as much explanation as possible. We sought to find the best definition. The reply of the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold)—I was grateful to her for it—dealt with the precedent for the word "desirable". I accept entirely what she said about that being an appropriate word. The amendments do not preclude desirability as a factor, if that is thought to be appropriate. However, the amendments seek to provide for everybody who is interested in and affected by the rate support grant decisions of the Government the most material considerations—that is, the matters that relate to the basis of the Secretary of State's decision.

Perhaps the Minister will be able to say that what we are asking for is what the Government intend and that they will tell us a little more tomorrow. We are seeking to make clear the main criteria, so that when the annual reports on the rate support grant are published, there can be an assessment, year on year, of the change in the decision-making process and material parts of that, and in particular on the way in which the criteria that the Government have chosen to use are applied either local authority by local authority, or group of local authorities by group of local authorities.

As the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, amendment No. 32 is something that the Minister could meet by way of an undertaking. The Government are being asked to undertake that certain representations made are considered, and that there is a specific duty and process whereby matters raised in the amendment, brought singly by local authorities or by groups of local authorities, about the total expenditure or single expenditure of a local authority, can, when they are added to or subtracted from, be the subject of specific consideration by the Government. These are procedural matters, but they would help confidence building between local authorities and central Government, and the understanding of the processes of central Government. They would follow in the tradition that the previous Secretary of State said it was the intention of the legislation to carry out, that is, to make the process more simple and comprehensible. I hope that we can achieve some acceptance by the Minister of what is intended by the amendments.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am sorry to have to disappoint the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who has joined our debate. Perhaps he has dropped in to see whether the Opposition Front Bench is occupied. On one memorable occasion, he found it unoccupied and moved in, but I would not advise a takeover with the hon. Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) as bodyguards to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw).

[Mr. Waldegrave]

We went into the arguments about consideration in some detail in Committee. As the hon. Member for Blackburn was generous enough to say, if the law meant that every underlying consideration had to be published, that would produce a mountain of useless information, which would not help the local authorities or anybody else. A good way of hiding useful information is by surrounding it with useless information, and that is as good as not providing any information.

In Committee I told the hon. Member for Blackburn that we would look at other formulations that he provided, and we have done so. The hon. Gentleman suggested that "material considerations" should be specified, but I am advised that that would not help because it could be argued that every consideration underlying every GRE component is material. It would have done us no harm to have accepted a formulation that would have met the hon. Gentleman's point, but his suggestion would not work. Therefore, I have to ask him to accept that the declaration that we have made, with which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is associated, that it is not our intention to reduce the level of explanation given, should carry the burden of meeting the points that he and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey made.

On the fundamental and new point that the hon. Member for Blackburn made about trying to reintroduce the disregard system into the working of block grant, I have one of those dual-edged arguments. First, it is out of the question to do so, because that would plainly be turning the workings of the block grant into something different. Rather than allowing the redistributive system of the slope to do its work, it would reintroduce something much more like holdback and targets. On the other hand, we have, by law, to do a large part of what he wants. We have to consider any representation made about total expenditure and what should be included in it. Several representations have been and are being made, but it would take a very strong case to make us use the total expenditure definitions to reintroduce disregards in that way. It would take us back, to some extent, to the duality and complexity of having a target and holdback system.

Mr. Straw: Does the Minister accept that as long as the block grant mechanism is used for penal purposes and for purposes for which it was not intended — it was originally intended as a distribution system—there must be some safety valve to take account of expenditure that authorities have incurred, through no fault of their own, for national reasons or because of an act of God?

Mr. Waldegrave: I do not accept that argument. The block grant system, schedule and slope are used in response to a good deal of pressure from my right hon. and hon. Friends in order to try to provide a marginal taxation rate that puts greater pressures on the high spenders than on the low spenders. Within that, we do not accept that it would be sensible to reintroduce the additional complexity of a zero marginal rate for certain categories of expenditure. However, we will have to listen to representations on the definition of total expenditure. In view of that, perhaps the amendment will not be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Boyes: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 5, line 47, at end insert—

'(14.—(1) Section 57 of the said Act of 1980 shall be amended as follows:

(2) After subsection (3) there shall be inserted—

'(4) A local authority's grant-related expenditure shall not be less than the level of expenditure (if any) determined or redetermined by the Secretary of State for the authority under section 3 of the Rates Act 1986.'.

The amendment requires the Secretary of State, in determining grant-related expenditure for those authorities subject to rate limitation, to set it at a level that is not less than the expenditure level determined under section 3 of the Rates Act 1984. Section 3 enables the Secretary of State to determine an expenditure level for those authorities subject to rate limitations. The 1984 Act is also the primary legislation under which the new joint authorities are subject to precept control for a period of three years from their establishment.

It is a constant source of discontent that rate-capped and precept-controlled authorities are subject to two separately assessed bench marks of expenditure: GREA, being the formula-derived standard level of service, and the expenditure level, which is a more realistic assessment of what the Secretary of State believes is a reasonably achievable level of expenditure. At the basis of the argument is the principle that the expenditure level represents a recognition by the Secretary of State that that is the level at which authorities need to spend if they are to maintain a reasonable level of service. If that level of expenditure is reasonable, the artificially contrived GREA should be set at least at the same level. I can illustrate some of the problems with reference to newly established metropolitan joint police authorities for 1986-87. I live in Northumbria, and there the GREA is £43·178 million and the expenditure level is £43·431 million. Thus the level of expenditure is higher than the GREA.

But the difference can perhaps best be illustrated by looking at west Yorkshire. There, the GREA is £50·712 million and the expenditure is £63·269 million, a difference of almost £13 million.

An authority covered by the Rates Act 1984 may be expressly designated for rate limitation only if it appears to the Secretary of State that its total expenditure in the preceding year was excessive, having regard to general economic conditions. For the new police authorities which are deemed to be designated, there is no presumption that the total expenditure of the predecessor authorities in 1985-86 was excessive. In determining the expenditure level for these new authorities the Home Secretary's principle is that each authority should be broadly able to maintain the level of service for its area provided by the predecessor authority, and he takes into account all the individual circumstances of each authority.

It is clearly inequitable that in those conditions the GREA should be set lower than the expenditure level. There is a precedent for the suggested course of action. The GREA for the Metropolitan police is set equal to the budgeted expenditure and the amendment would ensure similar treatment for rate-capped and precept limited authorities. In other words, if it is good enough for the Met it is good enough for the police authorities.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Last year the Government sought to move towards reconciling the difference there had always been between target and GREA. That was always an inconsistency and it gave rise to some illogicalities complained about by hon. Members in all parts of the House. The complaint was that what local authorities could aspire to reach without penalty was not the basis on which their rate support grant was calculated compared to the needs of other local authorities. The amendment would continue the march towards consistency and would reconcile yet another and the most recently introduced of the Government's assessments — that applied under the Rates Act 1984 for rate capping purposes.

I hope that the Minister will be able to say that the Government will simplify matters by defining in one way for all purposes the specific amount of local authority expenditure calculated by them as being appropriate. It would seem logical that it should be extended to the calculations for the purposes of rate capping. I can understand that there may be an argument for saying that there is a common calculation, but there is room for an acceptable maximum that goes above that to allow scope within which local authorities can expend without being capped and having their rates determined by the Government.

If not tonight and in the context of this Bill, I hope that the Minister will be able to say that it is the intention to reconcile this definition with the others. The Minister may be able to shorten this debate by asking us to wait 12 hours at which time the Government will accede to the request in an announcement.

Mrs. Rumbold: As the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) has said, all local authorities and expecially the new joint authorities can be selected for the first three years but they can only be selected for rate limitation under section 2 of the Rates Act 1984 if their spending exceeds their grant-related expenditure in the year of designation.

I have to tell the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that the practice has been in the first two years of its operation that authorities are selected only if they are spending at least 20 per cent. above their grant-related expenditure. The amendment would arbitrarily increase the level of an authority's grant-related expenditure and would validate any authority that has chosen to indulge in high spending. it would also give them a higher grant entitlement at the expense of local and precepting authorities which are generally low spending. It would give them an unfair advantage and would let authorities out of rate limitation for the following year because by definition, those authorities would no longer be spending in excess of grant related expenditure. For those reasons I find it impossible to accept the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

12.14 am

Mr. Straw: My understanding was that the Minister would say a few words on Third Reading. I am delighted that he wants to speak after me rather than before me.

We have been over the ground of the Bill. It is three and a half months since the Minister came to the House to make his now-famous statement on the block grant multipliers. Never has a statement had such a fascinating title. Of course, the nation has been held enraptured ever since as we have pursued the Bill.

However, the Bill had a bad birth. It was dreamt up by Ministers to get them out of a difficulty caused by the application of their policies during the past seven years. It is a bad Bill, and we have not been convinced otherwise during our consideration of the measure. If we have the opportunity, we shall ensure that the Bill is pursued in the other place.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The criticism of the Bill from the beginning was that it was introduced solely because the courts had said that they would rule against the Government. It was the Government's response to the case brought by the city of Birmingham. It is never a satisfactory beginning for any legislation to be introduced as a way of getting the Government off a hook of their making and to alter the rules that they laid down. The principle of retrospective legislation, as applied by the Government in the Bill, has never been adequately justified. It does not accord with the principles of retrospective legislation that is acceptable and has been used in the past.

The Bill includes a couple of tidying-up mechanisms which are acceptable, but the part of the long title which suggests that the other major purpose of the Bill was,

"to clarify and amend the law relating to rate support grants,"

has not, sadly, produced the clarification and amendment that many of us would have wished.

It is clearly now an issue as to whether the Bill can be debated only by the House of Commons. I hope that those who consider such matters will remember that the Bill contains matters that relate not only to finance. Indeed, the second part of the long title makes it perfectly clear that the clarification and explanation of the law — for example, the explanation of what goes into the determination of rate support grant — goes far beyond that. I hope that the Bill will go to the other place, where it can be debated and, if necessary, amended. With the Bill, the Government have made no substantial progress towards convincing the Opposition, and many of their own Back-Benchers, that they have yet got the rules, let alone the application, of the rate support grant and rating system anywhere near right.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): We understand that this could be a money Bill. Had we known or suspected that previously, the Committee stage would have been much longer than it was. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when a Committee considers amendments to a Bill, it also looks to the Lords to table other amendments. If the Bill does not go to the other place, some matters will not be debated at all. I wish to put some of them on record.

In this Bill, the Secretary of State has taken to himself great powers. But those powers will be available to any Secretary of State, of any political persuasion, once they are on the statute book. The Bill talks about local authorities

"belonging to the appropriate class."

For the first time, we shall be in danger of placing authorities into classes for the distribution of rate support grants. The amount that they receive will depend on their class, not the special difficulties to be found in those local authority areas. The Bill, if passed, will give the Secretary of State powers to direct finance to any authority in any way that he wishes. If the Secretary of State exercises those powers in one direction, he must remember that a Labour Government can exercise them in another.

Mr. Waldegrave: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to say a few words. We are about to pass a Bill which will clarify the law and make it what it was thought to be in a number of important technical respects in relation to rate support grant settlements. I hope that we have blocked off one or two other technical opportunities for challenge which would have introduced further confusion into the rate support grant settlements, both those that have been made in the past and will be made in the future.

I am grateful for the support given by my hon. Friends in Committee and on the Floor of the House. The Opposition have probed the Bill properly and introduced a number of powerful arguments, in particular relating to Birmingham, if I may mention that dreaded city. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Not dreaded in any real sense—that attractive and important city. We have all learnt a great deal about Birmingham; but, apart from that, I think that the general opinion of the House will be that the Government have thoroughly won the argument on the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Insolvency Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

12.21 am

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This Bill, and the Bill which the House is to consider next—the Company Directors Disqualification Bill—are the product of a single consolidation exercise and are therefore closely linked. With the permission of the House, I will speak to both Bills now since it is not really possible to explain why the consolidation exercise was necessary without referring to both Bills.

This consolidation presents an unusual feature in that much of the legislation which is to be consolidated is of very recent origin. The principal legislation concerned is a part of the Companies Act 1985 and the bulk of the Insolvency Act 1985. The House will recall that the Companies Act was itself passed as part of a major consolidating exercise. The Insolvency Act made major revisions in the law relating to personal bankruptcy and also made amendments to the companies legislation. Necessary though it was to enact these two major pieces of legislation last year, the result has been to leave the law relating to insolvency split between two statutes. It was recognised that this left the law in an unsatisfactory state and a consolidating exercise was at once set in hand. Fortunately, since the bulk of the Insolvency Act was not to come into force before the end of this year, the opportunity arises to effect the consolidation with the minimum of disruption to practitioners in this area of the law and anybody else affected by it, and before a large body of supplementary subordinate legislation comes to be made.

The Insolvency Bill now before the House contains in one code of legislation the law relating to insolvency as respects both companies and individuals. The Company Directors Disqualification Bill brings together the provisions concerning disqualification from the management of companies.

Both Bills have been passed in another place where they were referred, in the usual way, to the Joint Committee on Consolidation, &c., Bills. The Joint Committee reported that the Bills were pure consolidation, though a small number of drafting changes and corrections were made by the Joint Committee and at Committee stage in another place. We are, as always, grateful to the Committee for its painstaking scrutiny. The two Bills constitute a very necessary consolidation in this most important area of the law and they will be of great benefit to practitioners and others. Our gratitude is due to the draftsman for producing the Bills in the short time available and to the Joint Committee for its consideration of the Bills.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): It is unusual for the House to consider legislation that was passed only last year, but there are good reasons for doing so, and I am sure that the legislation will be welcome in its new form, especially to practitioners, as the Solicitor-General said.

I understand that these are the last two Bills that will be considered by the Consolidation Committee under the chairmanship of Lord Brightman. I associate the Opposition with the tribute to his work, which is much appreciated by the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Terms and Conditions of Employment

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79 (Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

That the draft Job Release Act 1977 (Continuation) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 1st July, be approved.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Measures against Counterfeit Goods

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80 (Standing Committees on European Community Documents)

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4092/85 and 4058/86, a proposal for a Regulation laying down measures to discourage the release for free circulation of counterfeit goods, and a proposed Amendment to the draft Regulation; recognises that there is much justified concern at the size and growth of the world-wide problem of counterfeiting; supports the activities of the Community in trying to find ways to contain international trade in counterfeit goods generally; and supports an instrument which would provide more effective measures to prevent counterfeit goods from reaching the internal market of the community.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Mrs. Irina Ratushinskaya

12.30 am

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by David Somerville of Heaton Park drive, Bradford and 144 of my constituents from the congregations of St. Cuthbert's Roman Catholic church, St. Barnabas church and Westgate Baptist church, which calls attention to the plight of Irina Ratushinskaya, a poet, who is confined in a Soviet labour camp because of her poetry. She is in very poor health and, in the view of her husband and other fellow prisoners, her life is in danger.

The petitioners pray that your honourable House encourages the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues in their representations to the Soviet Government with the purpose of obtaining both the release of Mrs. Ratushinskaya from the labour camp and her urgently needed assessment and treatment.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by Kath Parry of Duchy avenue, Bradford and 89 of my constituents — the signatures were collected in one hour — which emphasises

That the costs of SDI research would divert public money which might be spent to alleviate the financial cuts now being inflicted on health, welfare and educational services or on the modernisation of our manufacturing industries.

The petitioners pray that your honourable House to make public the secret agreements governing both United States bases and Star Wars research in Britain; to take steps to remove the American nuclear bases and to end Star Wars research; to take positive initiatives to end Britain's role in the nuclear arms race and to promote the peaceful solution of international problems.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. L. Hedges (Pension)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

12.32 am

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Hon. Members are not infrequently approached by constituents who seek assistance in resolving a matter that they feel to be unjust or unfair. Frequently help can be sought from a Government Department, they can be advised of possible legal remedies, or, on some occasions, assistance can even be sought from the parliamentary ombudsman.

From time to time one is approached by a constituent who has a case that is not so simple, where advice from all the relevant Government Departments has been given, where, on the face of it, there would appear to be nothing for which there could be legal address, but where, none the less, if all the facts were known, the man on the proverbial Clapham omnibus or the man in the Bicester high street would say, "Hey, that is not right; it is not fair. Something ought to be done about it."

In such circumstances it is right to draw the attention of the House to the matter, first, in the hope that a re-examination of the facts might act as a catalyst for a re-examination of, and, perhaps, a happy solution to the case, and, secondly, so that others can take note of the lessons to be learnt from the case. I am grateful that this debate enables me to raise one such case, that of the pension from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority of Mr. Leslie Hedges, a constituent of mine. I am grateful to the Minister for the time and attention that he has already given to this case.

Mr. Hedges retired in 1980 after 40 years of employment in the public service, throughout which time he paid a full contribution towards his pension. From 1937 to 1948 he worked for the Oxfordshire county council; from 1948 to 1961 he worked for the National Health Service; and from 1961 he transferred his employment to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority at Harwell.

Shortly after Mr. Hedges transferred to Harwell, the superannuation officer of the AEA wrote to him confirming that in respect of his earlier employment he had been credited 20 years and 88 days in the UKAEA non-industrial superannuation scheme. Thus, in 1961 Mr. Hedges commenced his employment with the UKAEA with no fewer than 20 years of fully paid-up pension contributions already made. It is perhaps worth noting in passing that Mr. Hedges retained the letter sent to him in September 1962 by the UKAEA about his pension, which would seem to suggest a cautious, prudent man, rather than a man who might gamble with his future, as some came to suggest later.

If Mr. Hedges had stayed with the UKAEA until the age of 65, he would have received a full pension based on 40 years' service and his final salary. Furthermore, he would have received a tax-free lump sum of three times his annual pension. However, in 1970, after 10 years' service at UKAEA, and by now 30 years' service in the public sector, and at the age of 55 years, Mr. Hedges resigned his post as clerical officer at Harwell and took up employment at the University of Oxford. At this point matters go awry in respect of Mr. Hedges' pension.

The sensible thing would have been for Mr. Hedges to be able to transfer his 30 years' pensionable service from the UKAEA's non-industrial superannuation scheme to the pension scheme of the University of Oxford. The UKAEA pension scheme had a clear provision for the transfer of previous pension rights. Indeed, in 1961 Mr. Hedges had been able to transfer his accumulated pension rights from his local government and National Health Service employment to the UKAEA scheme. That, however, appeared not to be possible with the University of Oxford scheme.

Some years later, when, for reasons which I shall explain later, it became apparent that the value of Mr. Hedges' eventual pension was being substantially eroded, he made further inquiries of the university to ascertain whether it would take on his accumulated pension to date. The university was prepared to accept only the transfer of a cash sum from Mr. Hedges' previous employers. The cash sum that the UKAEA was prepared to make available to the university in respect of Mr. Hedges' pensionable service was only about £8,000. It should be remembered that that was for 30 years' fully reckonable pensionable service. Mr. Hedges had been paying about 6 per cent. of his salary while at UKAEA towards his pension.

Given this sum, the university was not prepared to credit Mr. Hedges with 30 years' pensionable service, nor 20 years, nor half, 15, but only 11 years and one month. When pensionable service is being transferred, the only consideration for the university is the cash value of the pensionable service offering the transfer payment. Put shortly, Mr. Hedges' new employer noted the value of what his former employers were prepared to transfer in respect of his pension contributions and, despite the fact that they represented 30 years' service, was able to offer only 11 years' credit within the rules of its own scheme It was understandable that at 55 years Mr. Hedges did not accept that.

I make no criticism of the university for its superannuation scheme. It was simply applying the rules of the scheme to the situation with which it was presented. I am not in a position to comment on the fairness or otherwise of the transfer value of about £8,000 that was offered by UKAEA. But it must be a matter of general concern when someone who has spent the larger part of his working life in the public sector finds in transferring his pension that it is worth considerably less than he had anticipated.

What happened to Mr. Hedges' pension? Apparently, until 1972 staff who resigned from UKAEA had an option under the rules of its non-industrial superannuation scheme to arrange at the time of their resignation for their superannuation rights to be reserved by the purchase of a deferred annuity instead of having their pension benefits frozen in the UKAEA scheme until normal retirement age. Put briefly, Mr. Hedges was given a choice: he could leave his pension benefits frozen in the United Kingdom AEA scheme until the time he retired, at which point he would receive a percentage of the pension relevant to his years of service, or he could, in effect, use his pension contributions up to the time of his resignation to purchase a deferred annuity.

Sadly, Mr. Hedges was given no advice as to the respective merits of such options nor as to their potential dangers. It so happened that the benefits offered by the insurance company in 1970 for a deferred annuity provided potentially a much higher fixed income on paper than the United Kingdom AEA alternative. But what no one mentioned and made clear to Mr. Hedges, when he considered which option to take, was that the apparent advantage of the deferred annuity was always vulnerable to inflation, and the danger that, in time, it would become less favourable.

I do not suggest that there was any negligent misstatement on behalf of the AEA. As far as I can ascertain, there was no advice at all. No one endeavoured to explain to Mr. Hedges that he was, as the deputy general secretary of the CPSA — Mr. Hedges' trade union — observed, taking a gamble that the annuity option would hold its value. No one told Mr. Hedges, or even hinted, that he was engaged in a gamble. As Mr. Hedges says, he is not a gambling man, and he certainly would not have gambled with his pension. He was simply given two options and he took the option which, at the time, seemed to be to his advantage and the most attractive.

It was not long before the ravages of continuing high inflation seriously eroded the value of Mr. Hedges' pension. With inflation now around 3 per cent., it is all too easy to forget those years of the 1970s with inflation, on occasions, over 25 per cent. Inflation destroyed the value of people's savings and pensions.

It did not take Harwell long to realise that the option could be disastrous for its former employees. In fact, in 1972, just two years after Mr. Hedges transferred to the University of Oxford, it removed the option. But for Mr. Hedges it was too late.

When Mr. Hedges realised what was happening he asked the United Kingdom AEA to change his choice. However, the AEA made it clear that deferred annuity arrangements were specifically in lieu of the benefits that would otherwise have been provided under the authority's scheme. The UKAEA maintained that its liability was discharged absolutely when the capital sum was paid to the insurance company in respect of Mr. Hedges' deferred annuity, and that it was not responsible for augmenting funds provided by the insurance company.

Even with inflation running at only 3 per cent., Mr. Hedges is becoming steadily worse off every month and year that passes. His pension, in respect of his 30 years' employment in the public sector, until he left the UKAEA is a derisory sum. It is just £868 per annum.

Should not the AEA have appreciated that it was offering a choice, one option of which, in times of rising inflation, could have a dramatic and devastating effect on Mr. Hedges' final pension?

How many others are there in the same position as Mr. Hedges? How many others resigning from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority prior to retirement age took that option? Why did the AEA not give Mr. Hedges some impartial advice as to the merits of the options available to him? After all, as Mr. Hedges has said to me, he could not believe that the UKAEA was acting other than in his best interests. He trusted the authority as an employer in the public sector. If the UKAEA realised in 1972 that this was an unsound option, should it not have appreciated that fact by 1970?

In 1980, the chairman of the UKAEA, Mr. Hill, said that he had

"sympathy with the problems caused by inflation for those who took deferred annuities rather than the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's superannuation scheme pension" and that UKAEA had

"looked most anxiously and carefully into the possibility of doing something to improve their pension position," but apparently the authority concluded that no remedy was available. However, I have no doubt that the proverbial man on the Clapham omnibus or the man in Bicester High street, if aware of the facts of the case, would say that it is unfair that someone who has given a lifetime of work in various ways to the community should find himself in this position.

Mr. Hedges simply and understandably wants a pension that reflects his many years of public service. I believe that this case merits re-examination. There may be similar cases. I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State simply to undertake that his Department will look into Mr. Hedges, case to ascertain whether, even at this late stage, there is some discretion to enable him to receive a reasonable pension in respect of his years of service and substantial contribution, and not one the value of which is eroded day by day and month and month.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) has raised with meticulous care an important issue on behalf of his constituent, Mr. Hedges. I have listened with close attention to what he has said, but, for reasons which I shall explain, I fear that there is nothing that the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority or the Department of Energy can do to improve the position of Mr. Hedges or of other pensioners in respect of the matters raised by my hon. Friend.

As my hon. Friend has told the House, Mr. Hedges joined the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority on 8 August 1961 as a clerical officer, having previously worked for a local authority and for the National Health Service. By means of the payment of a "transfer value" from the NHS pension scheme, he was able to make his previous local authority and NHS service superannuable in the authority's principal non-industrial superannuation scheme. The credit in the authority's scheme for previous service was 20 years and 88 days.

Mr. Hedges resigned from the authority on 14 August 1970 to take an administrative post with Oxford university. He had at that stage 29 years and 95 days in the authority's scheme, including the 20 years and 88 days of back service. At that time, Oxford university's pension scheme could not accept in transfers of pension rights earned with other employers. Mr. Hedges had the choice of two methods of preserving his accrued pension rights under the rules of the authority's pension scheme. First, he could have had his pension benefits "frozen" in the scheme until his contractual retirement age with the authority—65. Alternatively, he was able to purchase a "deferred annuity" — a policy with an insurance company which provided a lump sum and a fixed annual pension from age 65. It was the authority's principle and practice to leave individuals to choose the method of preservation they judged to be in their best interest.

The deferred annuity option had the primary purpose of providing a form of preserved pension provision for early leavers with less than 10 years' service who would otherwise, under the then rules of the scheme, have been entitled only to a refund of their own contribution, plus a small amount of interest, but less a deduction for tax. To improve the available benefits members were given an entitlement, if they wished, to transfer their pension benefits into an annuity policy to make some provision for retirement.

[Mr. Alastair Goodlad]

In addition, the deferred annuity option also gave those scheme leavers who had 10 or more years' service, and who therefore had a right to benefits to be preserved under the scheme, a degree of choice in how their benefits should be preserved. This extension was made at a time when the authority was having to run down staff numbers rapidly, and it was desirable to be able to offer maximum flexibility in pension provision for those who left to take up other employment. Contrary to the impression that I think was given by my hon. Friend, the authority transferred a proportion recommended by the actuary of its own, as well as Mr. Hedges' contributions.

As he requested in advance of resigning, Mr. Hedges was given details of, first, the value of his benefits if frozen in the authority's scheme and, secondly, the proceeds of a deferred annuity based on the then current rates. The amounts in round pounds were as follows. First, if he chose to stay "frozen" in the authority scheme, he would receive a lump sum of £710 and a pension of £398, though with a possibility that these amounts would be augmented by pensions increases.

Secondly, if he chose a deferred annuity, Mr. Hedges could have either a fixed lump sum of £1,883 or £2,153 with the benefit of estimated bonus — plus a fixed pension of £672 or £769 with estimated bonus — or alternatively a fixed pension of £896 or £1,024·19 with estimated bonus but no lump sum.

It was made clear that the estimated bonus was simply an estimate and in no way guaranteed. Assuming no pensions increases in the occupational scheme, the figures presented to Mr. Hedges indicated a relative attraction for the deferred annuity option, though of course, on the assumption that scheme pensions would be increased, this altered the relative attractiveness of the options. It was authority policy not to press employees to select one route rather than another, as the authority was in no position to predict future events.

On 13 July 1970, Mr. Hedges applied for a deferred annuity—making in effect the assumption that pensions increases would not catch up with the annuity—and on 17 August accepted the version of the deferred annuity "cash lump sum" plan.

I should explain here the authority's relationship with the insurance company involved. For all employees who wanted the deferred annuity option at that time, the authority entered into a master policy with the Guardian Assurance Company Ltd. It was this company's estimated rates that were quoted to the individuals concerned. The authority fully discharged to the Guardian all liability for pension provision for those individuals on whose behalf the authority paid over to the Guardian a capital sum to secure a deferred annuity policy. The authority had no powers of discretion concerning the proceeds of the policies.

When Mr. Hedges reached the age of 65 in 1980, proceeds of the annuity policy provided benefits of a lump sum of £2,479 and a fixed annuity of £868. Had he elected instead for the "maximum annuity" variant, he would have received an annuity of £1,157, but no lump sum. If Mr. Hedges' benefits had been preserved in the authority's own scheme, they would have been worth in 1980 with the benefit of pensions increases a £2,300 lump sum and £1,288 pension, and his pension now would be £2,141 a year. The particularly high levels of inflation experienced in the 1970s were difficult to foresee when Mr. Hedges resigned from the authority in 1970. The period of high inflation which eroded the value of fixed benefits has in retrospect shown that deferred annuities were a relatively poor choice to have made. But the judgment is made with the benefit of hindsight.

It would also have been impossible to foresee the introduction by the Government in 1971 of index-linked pensions. At the time Mr. Hodges made his decision in 1970, authority pensions were reviewed from time to time along with other public service pensions which were increased by individual Pensions Increase Acts. These increases were not regular and were not kept up with inflation, although they mitigated its effects. Subsequently, the Pensions (Increase) Act 1971 introduced updating every other year, and the Superannuation Act 1972 made updating mandatory on an annual basis. Such annual index-linking protects pensions from the eroding effects of inflation by increasing their value in line with rises in the retail price index.

In 1972, in view of the potential effect of inflation on the real value of deferred annuities, the authority decided to remove the annuity option from its pension scheme. I understand that that was done by administrative action, since the staff trade union side would not agree to the change. Until the annuity option was removed, some 786 employees had taken it.

I should like now to explain the attempts that have been made by the authority to alleviate the position of deferred annuitants, such as Mr. Hedges, both in general and in his particular case. A number of avenues have been pursued.

First, there have been discussions with the Department of Energy and its predecessors as to whether a way could be found of supplementing and index-linking deferred annuities ex gratia, on a par with public service schemes. But it was judged by the Department and the Civil Service Department that this would not be a proper use of public funds, given that those concerned had exercised a free choice in the knowledge that they were forfeiting all benefits under the authority scheme.

Secondly, on behalf of annuitants, the authority has asked the Guardian Assurance company whether it could increase the level of annuities in the light of interest rates and high inflation. However, the company has insisted that when it issued the policies the premiums were invested in a form so as to ensure that policy benefits were met, irrespective of future financial conditions. That meant that it had to invest the premiums in safe investments. It therefore said that it was not in a position to grant an increase in benefits provided by this means. The following is the relevant extract from its letter of 26 March 1982:

". . . when an Insurance Company issues a policy, the premium is invested in a form which will ensure that policy benefits are met irrespective of future financial conditions. In the specific case of annuity contracts, investment would normally be in gilt-edged securities. This ensures that a regular series of cash payments is provided. Should interest rates rise, the value of the investment will fall but the income from the investment is unaffected. To invest money on short-term deposit would leave the Company vulnerable to a fall in market rates of interest, the expected income from the investment would be insufficient to meet the required payments. The annuitants would be unprepared to accept a reduction in benefits if interest rates had fallen. The investment policy, therefore, avoids loss due to a fall in interest rates but (unfortunately) precludes profit on an increase. The Guardian is not therefore in a position to grant an increase in respect of benefits already purchased."

Thirdly, from 1 April 1978 the Oxford university scheme was able to accept in transfers of accrued pension rights earned with other organisations. The authority accordingly asked Guardian Assurance if the annuity could be cancelled and a transfer value offered. The insurance company agreed to that and the transfer value offered by the insurance company was £8,250. I stress that that sum was determined by the insurance company and not the authority. That sum would have produced only 11 years of pension credit in the Oxford university scheme as calculated by that scheme's actuary, compared with some 29 years which were originally converted into the annuity. Mr. Hedges declined the offer and retained his annuity which came into payment in 1980 when he was 65. A substantial proportion of deferred annuitants have likewise declined offers to unscramble their pension position through transfer values to an occupational pension scheme.

Fourthly, the authority considered the option of providing payments from authority funds, but concluded that it was not able to do that since, as already explained, it surrendered all liability for such individuals' pension position to the Guardian Assurance Company. Any payments would, therefore, be ex-gratia and had already been deemed to be an improper use of public funds.

Fifthly, the authority considered whether assistance could be made available from the authority's benevolent fund. The benevolent fund is an independent registered charity which has as its purpose under its constitution the relief of poverty among the authority's past and present non-industrial staff. It is managed by its own committee of management and is to all intents and purposes independent of the authority, which cannot give it directions on the use of its funds. I understand that Mr. Hedges did not meet the criteria necessary to benefit from the benevolent fund.

I am advised that in 1981 the authority board itself looked most carefully into the question whether any further steps could be taken to improve the pension position of its deferred annuitants. For the reasons I mentioned above it was forced to conclude that there were no further steps that could be taken.

I gather that Mr. Hedges wrote a letter of protest to my hon. Friend's predecessor in 1980 when his annuity came into payment. The then authority chairman, Sir John Hill, replied to the hon. Member expressing his concern and regret about the deferred annuitants' position but explaining that their decision on the means of preservation had been freely taken and that they were left in no doubt at the time that their decision on the means of preservation was in lieu of any continuing benefit from the authority's pension scheme. Sir John Hill pointed out that "the apparent advantage of the deferred annuity [had always been] vulnerable to inflation and to the danger that it would become less favourable at some point in time."

There appear to be no avenues left unexhausted by the authority to enable it to do anything towards alleviating the position of Mr. Hedges and his fellow annuitants. Other public sector bodies, including the CEGB, have been forced to a similar conclusion about their own position. I think that the House will agree that the authority has gone to very considerable lengths to try to alleviate the problem and that Mr. Hedges was not misled about his pension position.

Mr. Hedges' experience, and that of others like him, demonstrates clearly the damaging effects of high inflation on people's lives. It is a further reason, if such were necessary, why the Government's determination to ensure that inflation is kept under control is very important indeed.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

1. Mr. Evans asked the Paymaster General what is the present rate of unemployment; and how it compares with the figures for June 1983 and June 1979, respectively.

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The seasonally adjusted level of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom this June represented 11·7 per cent. of the working population. Estimates on a consistent basis for June 1983 and June 1979 were 10·8 and 4·2 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Evans: Will the Paymaster General confirm that, despite the 16th massaging of the figures since the Government took office, the underlying level of unemployment is at its highest point for over 50 years? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that virtually every employers' organisation has joined the Select Committee on Employment in demanding a Government programme of infrastructure work, which would not only put hundreds of thousands of people back to work, but would improve the nation's productivity? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledge that the overwhelming majority of the people now want measures to tackle unemployment even more than income tax cuts?

Mr. Clarke: The rate of unemployment is too high, and reflects the difficulty of creating new jobs quickly enough to keep up with the rising numbers of people looking for work. The fact is that over 1 million new jobs have been created in the British economy since spring 1983, and the rate of employment—people in work—has gone up by 4·3 per cent. since the first quarter of 1983, but obviously we have to improve on that record. I am intrigued to see that the hon. Gentleman is now going back to infrastructure spending as the cure. I continue to watch the varying suggestions put forward by the Opposition as to how they can live up to their claims for reducing unemployment.

Mr. Sayeed: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there are now more people in work in my constituency of Bristol, East? Is he further aware that that trend is reflected throughout the country?

Mr. Clarke: There are more people at work in this country all the time. We actually have a higher proportion of our population of working age in work than any other country in western Europe, apart from Denmark. Of course, we are having to tackle the problem that all the time more young people and more women are entering the labour force, so that we still have not caught up with the level of unemployment.

Mr. Leighton: Is the Minister aware that in 1978 unemployment fell by 90,000. In 1979 it fell by 60,000. In the following year, 1980, after the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Government came into office, unemployment increased by 700,000. In 1981 unmployment rose by over 900,000 and it has risen every year since. Is that not because the Government's economic policies have turned off the engines of economic growth and wealth creation? We are producing fewer manufactured goods now than we were in 1979. When will the Minister show some contrition and apologise to the unemployed, rather than taking the flippant attitude that he does to this disaster?

Mr. Clarke: I have not been flippant. The hon. Gentleman's figures cannot disguise the fact that, in 1979, the country's economy was in a dire state. A great deal of our industry was in a non-competitive condition. When the last Labour Government left office we were set on a course for higher unemployment and the world recession made it worse. However, unemployment rose at a faster rate in West Germany than it rose here. We are now back on the road to recovery. The number of new jobs in the British economy continues to rise steadily, quarter by quarter, and has done ever since early 1983.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall a book written by the general secretary of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs when the last Labour Government held office? Its title was "The Collapse of Work" and it postulated an unemployment level of 5 million under that Labour Government because of Britain's lack of competitiveness. Does he agree that unemployment could rapidly reach the level contemplated by Mr. Clive Jenkins if Opposition Members were ever able to put their inflationary spending plans into practice?

Mr. Clarke: I certainly recall some such analysis. I think the figure of 5 million people unemployed is wholly credible when one looks at the state of the economy as the last Labour Government left it in 1979. Unemployment would probably be at that figure now were it not for the fact that we are in the sixth successive year of economic growth and we are witnessing a steady increase in the number of new jobs in the economy.

Mr. Wainwright: Is the Minister aware that during the first quarter of this year and for the first time in several years there was an actual decrease in the number of employees in employment. The Government were only saved from the greater embarrassment of a decrease in the national total of people at work, of any kind, by the convenient arrival of a round figure of 30,000 people assumed to be in self employment and hence representing an increase in the numbers at work. Will he explain to the House the particular witchcraft by which figures like this 30,000 are produced in respect of the self-employed?

Mr. Clarke: There is a changing pattern of employment in this country. For some years the number of people in self-employment have been steadily rising. More than one person in 10 working in this country is now working on his own account. The estimates that have been produced are carefully calculated. They are checked regularly against the labour force survey and are produced by well-tried methods showing the estimated increase month by month. There is no witchcraft in it. These are careful, accurate statistics, as has been well proven in the past.

Mr. Marland: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that we are facing another industrial revolution? The reason why it is so painful has been the reluctance of past politicians and trade union leaders to embrace new and modern technology for the opportunities that it offers.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. The attempt to delay the impact of new technology and to ignore the increased competitive pressures of the 1970s led to the disaster that we eventually suffered at the end of that decade and the beginning of this one. What is happening now is that new industries are emerging, more people are working in smaller businesses, we are witnessing a good rate of new business creation and more people are working in self-employment. The labour market is changing, but it is providing more jobs. We must not allow the Opposition's policies to try to put the clock back.

Unemployment Benefit Service

2. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to increase the efficiency of the unemployment benefit service.

5. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General if he plans to make any changes in the operation of unemployment benefit offices.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): A variety of changes in the unemployment benefit service are planned and under way to improve efficiency, service and the control of public funds.

Amongst the most significant is the installation of new computer terminals in local offices, which will reduce staff work and provide better information to claimants.

Mr. Allan McKay: I thank the Minister for that reply and for the increased efficiency of the offices. With regard to increased efficiency, does the Minister agree that redundant mineworkers, like any other redundant workers, do on occasion need help and advice concerning unemployment and welfare benefits? If the Minister agrees, will he withdraw the directive sent to the offices on 15 April, and, if he does not, will he put his reasons in the Official Report?

Mr. Lang: We often give help to unemployment benefit offices to enable them to assist applicants for unemployment benefit. These are complex issues involving the interrelation between the redundant mineworkers payment scheme and the unemployment benefit service. Such guidance as has been given has been intended to give assistance to people in those circumstances and has involved the National Coal Board and the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: If the Minister's claim that advice was given in an attempt to help the miners is sincere, why did the letter to unemployment benefit offices quite specifically say that in no circumstances should advice be given to miners about whether they were entitled to claim unemployment benefit? Will he confirm that miners have been singled out for a vindictive and squalid little campaign to prevent them from drawing what they are entitled to?

Mr. Lang: Miners have not been singled out. Advice is often given in these circumstances. The intention of the circular was to enable us to be sure that unemployment offices would not give wrong advice to mineworkers and thus prejudice their interests.

Mr. Latham: Will my hon. Friend have a look at the Public Accounts Committee's report and ask himself whether there is a good case for merging these offices with the DHSS?

Mr. Lang: I shall certainly look at the report. The two organisations perform essentially different activities, but there is scope for improved co-operation between them.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: As one who was made unemployed by Robert Maxwell years ago — he was perhaps the worst employer in the country, and, I believe, still is — may I ask my hon. Friend to investigate how people claim unemployment benefit and the ease with which somebody whose name begins with B for Bruinvels can make a claim at 9.15 am and get a job for the rest of the day, not that I ever did that?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is on to a serious and important issue which is being given close attention by my Department.

Labour Statistics

3. Mr. Dormand asked the Paymaster General what was the number of persons unemployed for one year and two years, respectively, at May 1979 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Direct comparisons of unemployment by duration since 1979 are not possible because of changes in the way figures are collected. However, on 5 April 1979 the numbers of people in the United Kingdom who had been registered unemployed for over one year and over two years were 366,700 and 179,800 respectively. The corresponding numbers of unemployed claimants as at 10 April 1986 were 1,356,500 and 845,200 respectively.

Mr. Dormand: Does the Paymaster General agree that those appalling comparisons are the biggest condemnation of the Government's economic policies? I remind him yet again that the number of long-term unemployed now is greater than the total number unemployed people when Labour left office. When will he recognise that the present tinkering with schemes does not meet the problem and that there will have to be a fundamental change of policy? He should come to my constituency and talk to some of the long-term unemployed and see what they think about what he is doing.

Mr. Clarke: I agree that long-term unemployment is the biggest social problem that faces the country. It is more serious than the total figure, which disguises the fact that 500,000 people find a new job each month. The 1·4 million long-term unemployed are those to whom we are giving particular attention. Every long-term unemployed person in the hon. Gentleman's constituency will be interviewed during the next few months under the restart initiative, and each will be offered eight different ways in which he might get back into work. That will continue the considerable success that we have already enjoyed in the nine pilot areas.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one of the main reasons why this country suffers from high levels of long-term unemployment is the legacy of the anti-business, anti-enterprise, anti-profit policies which were pursued by the last Labour Government?

Mr. Clarke: Yes, and it is extremely important to reverse that part of our culture. That is why our Department and others concentrate so heavily on, for example, the business expansion scheme to encourage investment in new business, and why we are constantly strengthening the small business service and local enterprise agencies and all the other methods that we have to encourage enterprise culture.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Paymaster General accept the view advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) about there being large pockets of unemployment, especially in mining areas where there have been pit closures? Will he take on board the fact that unemployment in those areas is high and that the number of people who have been unemployed for 12 months or more is high? Will he do something about that and ensure that unemployment is brought down, and that employment is created in mining constituencies?

Mr. Clarke: I accept the need for efforts of that kind and I am glad that the National Coal Board's enterprise company has been so successful in helping people to establish themselves in business and to bring new businesses into the coalfields. We need more efforts of that kind and more successes of the kind being achieved in places such as Consett and Corby, steel towns which where badly hit by redundancies. The same needs to be done wherever major redundancies occur in older, traditional industries.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: While unemployment is so high, does my right hon. and learned Friend think it justified to allow more than 250,000 Irish nationals to work in the British economy?

Mr. Clarke: That is a long-standing issue, going back to the creation of the Irish Republic in the 1920s. Free movement of labour is an important principle of the European Community, from which we benefit as much as anyone else. Questions about access of Irish citizens to this country are best referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Prescott: The Paymaster General now officially recognises that more than 1 million more people have been unemployed for more than 12 months since the Government came to power. As the Government profess concern for those people, does he accept that recent changes to the Social Security Bill mean that a married man with two children taking a community scheme job will face a cut in pay or a suspension in benefit for 13 weeks? Is a conscripted labour force the Government's alternative policy?

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate that that is one reason why the community programme is more attractive to younger and single employees. Tomorrow we shall be discussing reforms in the social security system which improve support for low-earning heads of families. That will be of great benefit to people wishing to get into work and away from unemployment. The job start allowance, now available nationally, provides a £20 a week allowance for a man obliged to take a low-paid job as his first job back in work. That will also help.

Job Creation

4. Mr. Yeo asked the Paymaster General what steps his Department is taking to seek to reduce unemployment in the town of Haverhill.

Mr. Lang: The Government's economic strategy is providing the climate of low inflation and sustained growth which is the only sensible way to secure real jobs in Haverhill and elsewhere. Haverhill will also benefit from the new package of measures announced in the Budget to accelerate the growth of enterprise, boost employment opportunities for the young and help the long-term unemployed find work.

Mr. Yeo: Is my hon. Friend aware that Haverhill has the most severe unemployment problem in my constituency and that although many of the measures to which he has referred are both welcome and helpful, his Department's initiatives are frequently obstructed by shortcomings in the policies of other Departments? Is he aware, for example, that Haverhill is blighted by poor road communications and is a victim of extremely poor and inadequate strategic planning? Will he prevail on his colleagues in other Departments to consider the employment implications of their policies when working them out?

Mr. Lang: We constantly try to co-operate with other Departments in formulating Government policies, but I shall pass on my hon. Friend's remarks to my colleagues. With regard to my own Department, I am sure that my hon. Friend will welcome the substantial involvement in his constituency in the youth training scheme and community programmes and the fact that in the Norfolk and Suffolk area some 4,000 people have benefited from the enterprise allowance scheme since it started.

Maternity Leave

6. Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General how many women will lose maternity leave rights under the proposals contained in the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers."

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The White Paper is based on the need to reduce employment costs to industry if we are to increase the prospect of additional jobs for men and women. The White Paper proposals affect the right to return to work after maternity absence, but no women would lose maternity rights for which they have already qualified. It is very difficult to estimate how many expectant mothers would subsequently be affected by any changes.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that if the White Paper proposals are fully implemented, in the future the majority of women will lose their right to maternity benefit? Does he agree that removing rights and protection given to women in the past is an appalling way to proceed in 1986, and is the wrong way for the Government to go?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure what aspect the hon. Gentleman is concerned about. Maternity pay is not affected by our White Paper, although it is affected by changes being made by another Department. With regard to the right to return to work, the difficulty is that for a small firm it is a considerable burden to keep a job open for up to 40 weeks for someone who might exercise the right to return. That is why we made the proposals in the White Paper. It is very difficult to achieve the right balance between the need to protect employees and the need to keep industrial costs down. We believe that the balance needs to be shifted further so that employers are not deterred, for example, from employing young women.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept our congratulations on publishing the White Paper, which has shown that this country can be properly governed by a Government who are determined to ensure that we put businesses before barriers and that we get rid of unnecessary regulations in line with the requirements of a modern economy?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. My right hon. and noble Friend and I are constantly being invited to make speeches abroad, particularly in western Europe, where the interest in this kind of approach to encouraging jobs in industry is steadily growing and where a number of other Governments are plainly proposing to imitate us.

Ms. Richardson: Thanks to Government changes in the employment protection laws, is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that maternity provision in the United Kingdom will now be more restrictive and maternity benefits the lowest of any EEC country? As this year marks the 10th anniversary of the implementation of the statutory right of women to return to work after child birth, is not the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers" a rotten gift to give to women?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure about the hon. Lady's comparisons, but we already have a higher proportion of women in work and a lower level of unemployment among women than in most other western European countries. Those European countries which on paper have stronger maternity protection than we do have probably reduced the job opportunities for women.

Wage Rates

7. Mr. McKelvey asked the Paymaster General what is his latest estimate of firms paying workers less than wages councils' minimum rates in (a) Scotland and (b) England and Wales; and how many subsequent prosecutions have taken place.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): No estimates of the number of firms paying workers less than the wages councils' minimum rates have been made. However, Wages Inspectorate statistics for 1985 show that 20·8 per cent. of all establishments checked in Scotland were underpaying one or more of their workers. The corresponding figure for England and Wales was 22·4 per cent. But these figures are not representative of all firms because the inspectorate tends to concentrate on the firms more likely to be underpaying. In the same year, no firms in Scotland and two firms in England and Wales were prosecuted for offences under wages council legislation.

Mr. McKelvey: Am I correct in my view that the Minister is saying that 3,000 firms in Scotland alone do not pay the minimum rate—in other words, they pay less than the scab rate—and that not one prosecution has taken place? I should like the House to know, because it has the right to know, whether any political instructions have been given to procurators fiscal not to prosecute in these cases. What is happening is a national scandal, coming as it does from a party that is supposed to stand for law and order.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman has extrapolated ingeniously but wholly incorrectly the figures to which I referred in my substantive answer. It will be interesting for the hon. Gentleman to hear the contrast between what is happening now and what happened when the Labour Government were last in office. In the three years to 1978, the last full year in which the Labour party was in office, 35·4 per cent. of establishments inspected were found to be underpaying. Under the last Labour Government, the average number of prosecutions was five a year. Since 1980, under this Government, the average number of prosecutions has been the same.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that procurators fiscal in Scotland have always enjoyed discretion in relation to prosecutions? I say that as the parliamentary spokesman for the procurators fiscal. Does my hon. Friend also agree that we, as the party of law and order, believe that when the law is seen not to be effective and not to be working, the answer is to change the law? That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Trippier: Whether such cases go to the procurator fiscal depends on the recommendation of the various inspectorates that operate either in England and Wales or in Scotland. Under successive Governments—Labour as well as Conservative — the policy has been to seek compliance with the legislation by advice and persuasion. A prosecution is considered where the offence is deliberate or repeated and the evidence is adequate.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Minister confirm that we have a rising trend of employers breaking the criminal law and paying the poorest in society less than they are entitled to? Will he confirm that the Government have dealt with that problem by cutting by one third the number of wages inspectors and now, in the Wages Bill, by introducing a law which will weaken protection and promises further cuts in the inspectorate? The Government are inviting employers to break the law more frequently at the cost of the poorest workers.

Mr. Trippier: Nothing would invite employers more to break the law than the statements that we have heard from the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends, which give employers the impression that they will get away with it. The truth is stated in a letter which I sent to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), which has been widely circulated and of which the hon. Lady is aware. The legislation is changing because we are removing a great deal of the bureaucracy that has been operating in this area with incredibly complicated wages councils orders. Employers who in future try to claim that they cannot comply with wages councils orders simply because they do not understand them will be in a much weaker position than would otherwise be the case. I made that point in my letter. Wages councils will now be free from their former complexity and it will be simpler and quicker to check compliance. I do not accept that there is a rising trend of law-breaking among employers, as the hon. lady suggested.

Payment of Bills

8. Mr. Ottaway asked the Paymaster General what response he has received to the guidance booklet on payment of bills published on 20 May.

Mr. Trippier: I have received a considerable volume of correspondence from public bodies, large and small firms and small business organisations welcoming this initiative. Many small businesses continue to emphasise the problems that late payment causes them.

Mr. Ottaway: My hon. Friend is on record as having said that if the voluntary code does not work he will introduce legislation, and some of us would like to see that sooner rather than later. How does he intend to monitor the success of the voluntary code, and for how long?

Mr. Trippier: I have one effective way of monitoring the success of the code, which is that 130,000 copies were printed and I have recently authorised the reprinting of it, so demand is considerable. I am sure that my hon. Friend would welcome that. I have said that we may have to consider legislation if the pilot scheme does not work, but that could be hazardous. Many people in various small firms organisations have made representations to me that on some occasions small firms do not pay the bills of other small firms on time and that sometimes small firms do not pay the bills of large firms on time. If legislation were introduced some small firms—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am trying to hear what is being

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister recall that more than seven years ago the Government were elected on the basis of relieving small firms of all the difficulties which the Tories believed surrounded them? It is now seven years later and the Tory Government have hammered small businesses to such an extent that the Government must now give them advice on how to pay their bills. What happened to the entrepreneurial society that was to produce all the wonderful profits with the help of the Government's policies? Would it not be nice for the 150,000 firms that have gone bankrupt during the past seven years to have even a letterbox through which to receive the code of conduct?

Mr. Trippier: That shows how much the hon. Gentleman is out of touch with what is going on in the small business community. The figures on the small firms front show a higher net increase in small businesses than has ever been recorded. We are involved in a code of practice for late payment of bills because we know that there is a cash problem when large firms delay the payment of bills to small firms.

Mr. Bellingham: While my hon. Friend is reluctant to introduce legislation at this stage, is he aware that many small firms feel strongly about the matter, and will he keep it under review? What extra pressures could be put on some of the biggest firms in the land, which pay bills only twice or three times a year?

Mr. Trippier: When I sent the code of practice to the 100 largest firms in the country, as my hon. Friend is suggesting, a number of them are guilty of delaying payments of bills. I found the response to be comforting. I am sure that the combination of the code of practice and the Finance Act 1982, which allows interest to be charged as long as the matter has been taken to court, will be effective.

Youth Training Scheme

9. Mr. Ashdown asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the number of two-year YTS places actually contracted for.

Mr. Trippier: At 1 July, the latest date for which statistics are available, contracts had been signed for 332,480 YTS places. This is nearly three quarters of the places we shall need during this year, and represents very good progress.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister aware that, according to figures that have been published by the Youth Training Board, only 44 per cent. of basic places had been contracted for by May and that a full 80 per cent. were still under negotiation? Will he say how much of an improvement that is? Does he realise that there is considerable concern among larger firms that the MSC is seeking to fill the old mode B-type places, with the result that it is having to suffer considerable delays in the placements that it would like to offer? Will the Minister explain what he intends to do about this?

Mr. Trippier: I do not accept the last part of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question, but I can update him on the first part. The latest figures show that 88 per cent. of the places that we need have been approved by AMBs. That is the definitive figure. It compares with 79 per cent. at this time last year, and that is substantial progress.

Mr. Dorrell: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most worrying aspects of the present unemployment position is a co-existence of high rates of employment and emerging skill shortages? Does it not follow that the increased investment that the Government are making in ensuring that the training effort is more closely attuned to labour needs will in the end reduce unemployment? Is it not extraordinary that Opposition parties that claim to espouse the cause of the unemployed should be so anxious to belittle the efforts that the Government are making?

Mr. Trippier: I welcome my hon. Friend's supplementary question and I agree with every word of it. We are trying to concentrate, as he has suggested, on more work-related training with the YTS. We think that a start should be made before young people leave school. Thus, there is a good reason for pushing TVEI, which is work-related. The two schemes are complementary.

Mr. James Hamilton: Will the Minister recognise that many of the young people who have been contracted to YTS schemes are not being taught any skills? Many of them are carrying out labouring-type jobs and, as a result, many of them are disillusioned. I sent a letter yesterday to the Paymaster General setting out the case of a young person who had been contracted to a YTS scheme and who had done a labourer's job from start to finish.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and I will consider the hon. Gentleman's letter. We shall study it carefully and respond as positively as we can. I think that he is wrong to suggest that young people on YTS schemes are disillusioned. The facts prove that more than 80 per cent. of those who have taken advantage of YTS places are satisfied with the training that they have received.

Mr. Lawler: Will my hon. Friend confirm the experience that I have had which is that in my constituency a significant number of young people are taking up YTS schemes voluntarily as a first option, and that others are giving up dead-end jobs, which they went into on leaving school, to go into the YTS to acquire a skill? Will he encourage the MSC to maintain the publicity campaign, which has been so successful, to counter some of the sniping criticism that comes from some Opposition Members and others?

Mr. Trippier: I welcome the last part of my hon. Friend's supplementary question. We are anxious, with the MSC much in the lead, to continue the publicity that seems to be widely welcomed throughout the country and not only by my right hon. and hon. Friends. The degree of flexibility that we have introduced to the scheme encourages youngsters who have never thought of self-employment, for example, to contemplate it. That is to be widely welcomed as well.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the Minister aware that there are serious difficulties emerging in various areas on mode B provision? Even on the April figures, 132 sponsors of mode B provision had given up, which equates to 10 to 12 per cent. of the places. Is there not a worrying tendency for inner urban area places and places that are open especially to young black people to diminish? What will the Minister do to encourage more YTS places in the inner cities and for more young blacks?

Mr. Trippier: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the premium places—not mode B places; we do not call them that. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) referred only to the actual places, not to the premium places. Those figures are higher. Ninety-seven per cent. of places have been approved. Our interest is in getting youngsters on to YTS. Where a number of managing agents have been saying that their schemes are closing down, my concern has been to make sure that all the youngsters previously covered by the scheme are adequately covered by the new scheme. The figure of 97 per cent. is very impressive.

Labour Statistics

10. Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General what is the figure of unemployment in the Sheffield travel-to-work area; and what percentage this is of the potential work force.

Mr. Lang: On 12 June 1986 the number of unemployed claimants in the Sheffield travel-to-work area was 46,700, which represents a local unemployment rate of 16·1 per cent.

Mr. Flannery: Does the Minister remember the poster put out during the 1979 election campaign, to try to prove to the people that the Tories would get them all back to work? Will he undertake to come to the great east end of Sheffield, which lies so still and quiet, remembering only the promises made at that time? Will he hold out to our people some hope of returning to work? Will he come and see what his Government have done to working people? There are 16·9 per cent. out of work, and many others too, although the Government will not admit it.

Mr. Lang: We are certainly concerned about the level of unemployment in Sheffield and elsewhere. I regularly visit Sheffield. On one recent visit I called in at the job club at Woodhouse. The hon. Gentleman may care to know that that club enjoys considerable success, placing 78 per cent. of its members in jobs.

Mr. Dickens: Did we not come to office in the face of a world recession? Did we not come to office to be faced with over-manning through the cosy arrangements of the Socialists and the Lib-Lab pact? Did we not have to face the bulge year for school leavers? Have we not outstripped the rest of Europe in job creation? Are there not more people working today than ever before? Is not 1987 likely to be a good year for getting people back to work?

Mr. Lang: In spite of the difficulties described by my hon. Friend, we have managed to ensure that over 5,000 people in the Sheffield area are benefiting from the youth training scheme and over 5,000 from the community programme. We have also managed to make sure that Sheffield has benefited from £8·5 million in regional assistance since 1979, and has been allocated over £4 million under the urban programme for the current year.

Mr. Duffy: Is the Minister aware that the recently published report of the Sheffield careers service declares that there is no real improvement in employment opportunities for young people? Last year—the seventh year of Tory Government — it had the dubious distinction of returning the highest recorded figures for youth unemployment in the history of Sheffield. Which of the Government's policies will relieve those figures?

Mr. Lang: I have just referred to 5,000 places under the youth training scheme. Under the two-year scheme, the number of places in the current year will be 6,000. The number of unfilled vacancies at jobcentres in the area has risen by 53 per cent.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

11. Mr. Rowe asked the Paymaster General how many schools and colleges will be participating in the technical and vocational education initiative by the end of the current year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There are likely to be about 660 schools and colleges participating in the TVEI pilot projects by the end of 1986.

Mr. Rowe: Is that not a remarkable achievement, and one that is very much to be desired and that will go a long way towards meeting some of the skill shortages of which we have heard this afternoon? Will my right hon. and learned Friend take steps to ensure that when the young people concerned enter employment they are properly managed by kicking some of these companies — especially the 20 per cent. of large companies — which do no management training at all and therefore ill-treat or misuse the skills which my right hon. and learned Friend takes such care to develop at school?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his commendation of the steps that we have taken so far. Our experience shows that the improvement in the curriculum in schools and the greater work experience that it gives the pupils is now very popular with teachers, parents, pupils and potential employers of those coming out, which is why we have announced the national extension of the project. Industry still needs to put more effort into training in Britain. We continue to encourage firms to do so and we continue to give positive support to those firms which do.

Mr. Eastham: In uttering statements about making available £900 million over 10 years, was the Paymaster General not deceiving the people, because in fact only £12 million has been allocated for next year and only £41 million for the year after, which is only a drop in the ocean?

Mr. Clarke: The national extension is being phased in, which is why the expenditure builds up to an average of £90 million a year over the next 10 years. Obviously, it is necessary to phase in the national extension, building on the success of the pilots. The figure that we and the hon. Gentleman have cited is being provided for the initiative because of its value to pupils and industry.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Favell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen. Tonight I shall be attending a dinner at the United States embassy in honour of Mrs. Reagan.

Mr. Favell: On the day that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has announced his attack on NHS waiting lists, will my right hon. Friend consider the outstanding success of the partnership, in Wales between the NHS and the private sector in tackling a shortfall in kidney dialysis treatment? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the number of new patients has trebled as a result of that partnership, and is not there a great deal for the rest of the United Kingdom to learn from that?

The Prime Minister: We welcome the involvement of the private sector in the NHS making provision for services of that kind, which give excellent value for money. They often enable people on NHS lists to get much-needed treatment more quickly. It is for the local health authority to evaluate the treatment, but we wish that scheme well and hope that there will be more.

Mr. Steel: In all her considerations with our Commonwealth partners of the measures that we should be taking against the South African Government, what weight does the Prime Minister attach to her need to safeguard the position of Her Majesty as head of the Commonwealth?

The Prime Minister: As I said last week, Mr. Speaker, I propose to follow the well-established practice of my predecessors and not answer questions, direct or indirect, about the monarchy.

Sir Edward Gardner: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the two main aims of any policy towards South Africa should be, first, to end as soon as possible the system of apartheid, and, secondly, and equally important, to protect the victims of apartheid from any unnecessary and avoidable suffering and bloodshed? Does she further agree that both those aims must overrule and override all other considerations, including who will or will not take part in the Commonwealth Games?

The Prime Minister: I wholly agree with my hon. and learned Friend. It is our aim to end apartheid as soon as possible. [HON. MEMBERS: "How?"] By negotiation, and by not applying punitive sanctions, which would hit those whom we most wish to help. I agree wholly with my hon. and learned Friend that the games are the Commonwealth Games, and it would be best if those who have thought of boycotting them would reconsider their decision and come and join in those games.

Mr. Kinnock: Following the Harare meeting last week, is it not clear that a categorical statement from the Prime Minister to the effect that the British Government will impose sanctions against South Africa would increase the probability of restoring participation in the games, would improve the prospects of the Heads of Government meeting in August reaching productive conclusions, and would at the same time strengthen the hand of the Foreign Secretary in his visit in South Africa. Will the Prime Minister now make such a categorical statement?

The Prime Minister: No, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman is asking me to make a categorical statement before the Heads of Government meet to consider the matter. That is absurd.

Mr. Kinnock: By failing to make such a categorical statement at this stage, a categorical statement for which Commonwealth leaders both black and white have repeatedly asked, the Prime Minister is spoiling the games, is fracturing the Commonwealth and is sabotaging the mission of her own Foreign Secretary. Does she not realise that the Harare statement was an olive branch, or is she in such a state of paranoia that she cannot tell the difference between an olive branch and a club?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is asking us to reach a conclusion or to commit ourselves to a conclusion before the meeting which meets to consider the matter. That is an absurd way of going about any Heads of Government conference.

With regard to the Commonwealth Games, I stress that they do not belong to Britain or to Scotland. They belong to the Commonwealth. The countries which are withdrawing are damaging their own games and damaging the chances of their own athletes. In relation to the Heads of Government conference, we shall consider before we conclude.

Mr. Kinnock: The one thing that the Prime Minister says that is true is that the Commonwealth Games are not directly her business. What is her business is the withdrawals from the games, because that is entirely her fault. When she says that to make a categorical statement in favour of sanctions is absurd, is she saying that Rajiv Gandhi, Bob Hawke and Brian Mulroney and all the rest are absurd?

The Prime Minister: I am adhering to the Nassau accord. The Heads of Government, or their representatives, after the appropriate time, will then meet to review the situation. If in their opinion adequate progress has not been made within this period, we agree to consider the adoption of further measures. The right hon. Gentleman is following his old trick of reaching a conclusion before the meeting is even held.

Mr. Cyril Townsend: Bearing in mind the nature of the crisis in South Africa and Britain's pivotal position inside the international community on this issue, will my right hon. Friend at least keep open the possibility of personal talks with the state President, inside or outside South Africa, in the critical weeks ahead?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary goes to South Africa today to have talks with the President and a number of other people in South Africa — for more than one set of talks — and he may need to go again later. Obviously, I should like to consider the results of what he is able to achieve as President of the 12 countries of the Community before saying anything further. I do not exclude what my hon. Friend has said.

Q2. Mr. Craigen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Craigen: Does the Prime Minister know, and if she does will she tell us, whether some of the recent comments about the rift between No. 10 and the Palace on South Africa have arisen from certain sections of the Tory establishment——

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. [Interruption.]

Mr. Craigen: —have arisen from certain sections of the Tory establishment who feel that she has been in the job too long as Prime Minister and has developed monarchical tendencies of the absolutist kind?

The Prime Minister: I make it clear once again that I propose to follow the well-established practice of my predecessors and not answer direct or indirect questions about the monarch. I note that the hon. Gentleman has no complaints about how the Government are running the affairs of this country.

West Derbyshire

Q3. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Prime Minister whether she has any plans to visit West Derbyshire.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. McLoughlin: My constituents in West Derbyshire will be sorry to hear that my right hon. Friend has no plans to visit West Derbyshire at present. If she were able to visit West Derbyshire, they would tell her of their pleasure about yesterday's announcement by the Post Office of record profits and about the recent announcement of the profits of the [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has not been here for very long and he should be given consideration in asking his question.

Mr. McLoughlin: They would also tell her of their pleasure about profits recently announced by British Steel, the first profits for 11 years. Does my right hon. Friend not agree that that those profits hold out the prospects of a better future for the people who work in those industries than the major losses that were made when the Opposition were in government?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I join my hon. Friend in congratulating both the management and the workforce of British Steel on turning a £1 billion loss into a £38 million profit. It is excellent news. I congratulate, similarly, the management and workforce of the Post Office and Girobank, who have exceeded all the targets that the Government set for them. I will one day visit West Derbyshire.

Mr. Cyril Smith: If the Prime Minister did decide to visit West Derbyshire, does she think that it would increase or reduce the 100 Tory majority?

The Prime Minister: I am only after increasing the Tory majority.

Engagements

Q4. Mr. Ashton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ashton: As the Prime Minister cannot comment on her relationship with the Palace, can she comment on her relationship with her Back-Benchers? On the front page of yesterday's issue of The Times there was an article under the heading "Rebel Tories accused of Thatcher plot."

What does the Prime Minister intend to do about such treachery? Or is it really a plot by the editor of the Tory The Times Mr. Rupert Murdoch, to drive a wedge between the Palace and Downing street? Is she aware that many of us hope that the Prime Minister will not be forced to resign over a constitutional crisis, because we think that she is one of the best vote-winners the Labour party has got?

The Prime Minister: I propose to continue to answer questions from this Dispatch Box, in the hope that one day the standard of questions from the Opposition may improve.

Q5. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to welcome the visit of Mr. Peres to Morocco to meet King Hassan, which shows that the middle east peace process may be under way again? Since my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is hoping to meet ANC leaders in South Africa, will my right hon. Friend in due course authorise meetings with Palestinian leaders, including members of the PLO?

The Prime Minister: I hope that the ANC will agree to meet my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary on his visit to South Africa. If it does not do so, it will cast doubt on its commitment to try to solve the problem by peaceful means. Like my hon. Friend, I very much welcome the initiative of the Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. Peres, in visiting King Hassan of Morocco, with a view to a new initiative to help to solve the middle east problem. My hon. Friend will be very much aware that, unless the PLO accepts resolutions 242 and 338, I do not believe that it can be involved in negotiations to solve the middle east problem.

Mr. Loyden: In view of the answers given today on unemployment by the Prime Minister's right hon. and learned Friend, does she understand that the majority of people in this country now realise that the Tory Government have failed absolutely to solve the unemployment problem and that the scandal of unemployment is surpassed only by the Government's arrogance in disregarding completely the misery caused to millions of families by the direct actions of this Government?

The Prime Minister: The numbers of people in employment and in self-employment are once again rising, and that is good news. In the last three years 1 million jobs have been created. In the end we will solve the unemployment problem only when companies in manufacturing and services produce the goods and services that people are prepared to buy. The most worrying thing at present is the height of unit labour costs in Britain compared to those in other countries. That could be losing us export orders.

Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gregory: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to praise the British Railways Board and its hard-working staff for turning a massive loss last year into a surplus of over £49 million before taxation? Does she agree that the investment by the Government in electrification was a good investment?

The Prime Minister: I gladly congratulate British Rail on its excellent achievement. It has turned from a £408 million loss in 1984-85 to a small profit in 1985-86, and that is good news. I wish British Rail well and I am glad that we decided to invest in further electrification.

Miss Boothroyd: In view of the evasive answer given to me last week during Question Time by the Prime Minister, will she now take the opportunity to clarify her position? Is she in favour of early majority rule in South Africa, or is she not? The House demands an answer.

The Prime Minister: I am in favour of the process decided and described in the Nassau accord about apartheid. The Eminent Persons Group was sent to South Africa. The accord said — I shall read the whole paragraph — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister is answering the question.

The Prime Minister: The accord said:

"We agree on the compelling urgency of dismantling apartheid and erecting the structures of democracy in South Africa. The latter, in particular, demands a process of dialogue involving the true representatives of the majority black population of South Africa. We believe that we must do all we can to assist that process, while recognising that the forms of political settlement in South Africa are for the people of that country — all the people — to determine."

That was the unanimous view of the Commonwealth.

Miss Boothroyd: On a point of order Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise out of questions?

Miss Boothroyd: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As long as it is not a supplementary question, I shall allow it.

Miss Boothroyd: It is not a supplementary. I seek your guidance Mr. Speaker. Is it right for the First Minister of the Crown to treat the House in this way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is an experienced Chairman, and she knows that that is a supplementary question.

Rate Support Grant

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): With permission, I should like to make a statement about local government finance for 1987-88.

The Government believe that for 1987-88, there should be a rate support grant settlement which allows no increases or very low increases in rate bills if authorities budget responsibly, which provides greater certainty for all authorities about their grant entitlements, and which provides tough pressures on authorities that persist in overspending. I want to make it clear that this settlement means that high rate bills, or poor standards of service, or both, will be entirely the fault of the authorities concerned.

Under the present rating system, the link between the governed and the governors is being increasingly weakened. Our proposals for the future will certainly restore that link. Meanwhile, this settlement is designed to secure the greatest possible democratic accountability that the present system can yield.

My proposals are as follows. For local authority current expenditure, I propose to set provision at £25·2 billion. This is a cash increase of £2·9 billion over provision for 1987-88 published in January's public expenditure White Paper and is equivalent to an increase of 3·75 per cent. over local authorities' budgets for 1986-87. This level of provision represents a reasonable assessment of what local authorities will spend, given the level of inflation and their past pattern of spending. It does not follow that I believe that local authorities need to spend at this level. There is widespread scope for carrying out services more efficiently and for cutting out extravagant provision. Therefore, I am reviewing — I want to consult local authorities as usual about—the aggregate of GREs with the aim of keeping them broadly steady in real terms.

I propose to provide authorities with about £[illegible]·85 billion in aggregate Exchequer grant. This will maintain the grant percentage at 46·4 per cent. of relevant expenditure, the same as in 1986-87. This is a cash increase from 1986-87 of over £1 billion. This will mean that, if authorities spend in line with the generous provision that we have made, there should on average be no need for rate bills to increase at all. Ratepayers will have the certainty that the blame for high rate increases lies fairly and squarely at the door of their local authority.

These are very substantial increases, which I am sure will be welcome. They make it fair for me to propose a change that will both provide authorities with greater certainty as to their grant entitlement and increase the penalties for the reckless, putting greater pressure on authorities to spend less.

Hitherto, overspending authorities have contributed grant to a pool of money which was then recycled to all authorities on the basis of a common rate poundage. Individual authorities had no certainty as to their grant entitlements, which depended not only on their own expenditure decisions but on those of all other authorities. Of necessity, authorities could be informed of the estimated level of recylced grant only at a late stage, when it was difficult for them to take it into account in setting their rate or precept. More paradoxically, even those authorities that chose to overspend regained some recycled grant.

Therefore, I intend to introduce legislation in the autumn, after consultation, to abolish grant recyclying. As a result, authorities will be able to plan their budgets and rates with much greater assurance. Their grant entitlement will depend solely on their own expenditure decisions. It also means a tougher regime for high spenders. They will continue to lose grant if they overspend, but will not then gain on the roundabouts, by getting recycled grant, part of what they lost on the swings.

I move on to the incorrigible, for whom we have rate limitation. I am today laying before the House a report setting out how authorities will be selected next year. I am selecting authorities not selected in 1986-87 whose budgets are more than 12·5 per cent. above GRE and show growth of more than 4 per cent. since 1985-86. I am reselecting those authorities that were selected in the current year whose budgets are more than 12·5 per cent. above GRE and show growth either of more than 4 per cent. since 1985-86, or more than 20 per cent. since 1982-83.

On these criteria, nine authorities not selected in 1986-87 — Brent, Brighton, Gateshead, Hounslow, Middlesbrough, Newham, North Tyneside, Sheffield and Tower Hamlets — are selected. Eleven authorities are reselected — Basildon, Camden, Greenwich, Hackney, Haringey, Islington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Newcastle, Southwark and Thamesdown. Together with the authorities subject to automatic precept control under the Local Government Act 1985, this will mean that, in all, the Government will next year be limiting the rates or precepts of 40 authorities with expenditure totalling some £4·5 billion.

I am today also setting the expenditure levels for the 20 rate-capped authorities. For reselected authorities, there will be a cash standstill on expenditure levels for 1986-87. All but one of the nine newly selected authorities have budgeted in 1986-87 for a significant increase in spending. Therefore, I am setting their expenditure levels at the lower of their cash budget this year and a 6 per cent. increase over their 1985-86 budget. I am, of course, open to representations for redetermination of expenditure levels. As last year, where an authority applies for redetermination because it considers that special accounting arrangements imply unachievable economies in 1987-88, I will not use my powers to reduce expenditure levels or impose conditions.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Home Department, Education and Science, and Transport will be making separate announcements about expenditure levels for ILEA and the joint authorities subject to precept limitation under the Local Government Act 1985.

In the field of capital expenditure, I have to tell the House that, from authorities' own forecasts, we expect the main national cash limit in England to be overspent in 1986-87 by about £700 million.

The Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" set out proposals for a better capital control system, both for the benefit of the national economy and to give local government greater stability. I am urgently considering what steps to take in the light of the responses. I shall make a further announcement later.

I am acting now, however, to end an abuse relating to advance and deferred purchase schemes. These are borrowing schemes masquerading as expenditure. They make use of a bank or other intermediary to transfer expenditure from the year when work is done to an earlier or later year. On the scale that some authorities have indulged in recently, those devices store up massive problems for their ratepayers in the future.

I shall therefore introduce legislation to ensure that prescribed expenditure is incurred in the proper year regardless of when the authority pays. That will apply to all advance and deferred purchase arrangements, and other arrangements with a similar effect, entered into after midnight tonight. It will apply to England and Wales. Officials are writing to local authorities today with the details.

I am considering an exemption, so that authorities which genuinely need to use the device for its proper purpose for an occasional project are not disadvantaged. Any such exemption would also take effect from a date to be announced.

My proposals for this settlement — decisions on abolition of recycling, rate limitation, advance and deferred purchase — increase the pressure on high spending authorities. On the other hand, authorities which spend sensibly and prudently will have a clear opportunity to keep rate increases low. They will have greater certainty and will not have to gamble their budgets and rates on the unpredictable proceeds of recycling. Where authorities spend up, they will forfeit grant. Where spending exceeds all reasonable limits in flagrant disregard of the interest of ratepayers and local businesses, authorities will be subject to rate limitation.

With a realistic spending provision and a generous grant level that keeps the percentage of grant aid unchanged, I believe that this is a settlement which the whole House should welcome.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I begin by congratulating the Secretary of State on a very cleverly worded and presented statement: a statement, however, which is grotesquely misleading. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that he has improved the presentation while diminishing the substance of what he had to say? Whatever has happened to the criticisms and to the cacophony of calls of overspending and of abuse by local authorities round the country? Do not at least his words demonstrate the needless damage that has been inflicted on local authorities for the past six years?

Is the Secretary of State aware that in his statement it is easy to recognise the all too-obvious deception? He is planning to reduce grant-related expenditure aggregates. Is he not also effectively increasing penalties on all local authorities by making the slope of penalty for spending over GRE steeper and more punitive than ever before?

Is not the Secretary of State also, in his plan to end the recycling of grant, effectively saying to local authorities, "Here is additional money in the settlement, which will be taken away later, almost certainly in at least an equal amount, by the termination of the recycling of grant."? Does not that simply mean a massive windfall for the Treasury, which will be used for other purposes than local authority expenditure?

Does the Secretary of State agree with the Prime Minister's words in the Ryedale by-election when she claimed — as a result of the spending of Labour authorities in the main — that education spending per pupil was at a record level? Is the right hon. Gentleman planning to end that level of expenditure in the settlement? Will his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science agree?

Is it not clear from the studies by the expenditure groups of the Department of the Environment's own officials that any improvement in efficiency that local authorities may be able to achieve will amount to less than 1 per cent. of the total planned expenditure, so there is no way that local authorities can counteract the cuts that have been imposed on them in the past in that way? How can the Secretary of State claim that there will be little or no rates increases, when the Government are planning tomorrow to overturn the defeat in the House of Lords on the Social Security Bill, which will ensure, through legislation, that everyone, regardless of income, will have to pay a minimum of 20 per cent. of their rates bill in future? Does not that mean that thousands of families that do not pay anything at the moment will face major increases in their rates bill as a result of the legislation?

With regard to the end of the recycling of grant, is not the implication of what the Secretary of State has had to say that the Treasury may be taking back up to and perhaps beyond the £1 billion extra that he is saying will be available to local authorities as a result of the settlement? Does not the massive increase in rate capping mean that this Government are spreading even further the central domination and control of local authorities? How is it that, yet again, the right hon. Gentleman has been able to rig the criteria for rate capping to catch more Labour authorities, while avoiding the fact that the City of London is the biggest overspender of GREA of all authorities in the country? Is it not scandalous that he continues to rig the criteria to exclude the City of London, while including impoverished inner-city Labour authorities?

In his promise to legislate to end what is called creative accounting, is not the Secretary of State really enforcing further cuts on many authorities, reducing their freedom and flexibility, and their room for manoeuvre? Is not this statement, like all the others, a naked attack on local authorities, on the quality of the services that they provide, and on their freedom to provide the services that their electorates want? Like all the others, is it not doomed to bring political disaster to this Government, who are already on the road to defeat?

Mr. Ridley: I must check with my office to see whether the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was sent a copy of the wrong statement. I cannot make any correlation between his remarks and the welcome and important announcement which I have just made.

The local authority associations asked for the provision to be increased by £3 billion and it has been increased by nearly that amount. I simply cannot see how the hon. Member for Copeland can say that, in some way, this is not what local government asked for.

The hon. Gentleman alleged that the GREs had been reduced. As a result of the statement I have just made, the GREs will be increased by 3·75 per cent. or possibly more, subject to consulting the authorities. The hon. Member said that the slopes had been steepened for grant penalties. That is simply not true. I never mentioned anything of the sort, nor is it our intention to do so. So far, the hon. Gentleman has been wrong on three out of three and I regret to tell him that he is wrong on the fourth point, regarding grant recycling.

I have never heard a poorer response to a statement — generally welcomed by the House — and a more incompetent piece of analysis than that which came from the hon. Member for Copeland this afternoon. With regard to grant recycling, we have made realistic provision both for spending and for aggregate Exchequer grant. No authority need incur any penalty or forfeit grant provided that it does not spend more than this year's budget plus the GDP deflator. We have allowed for inflation and we have allowed for the present high level of spending, but if, on top of that, an authority makes a further increase in spending, it surely deserves to forfeit grant. If every authority behaves in the reasonable way that I have suggested, no grant will be forfeited. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion that £1 billion of grant would be forfeited is ridiculous. The hon. Gentleman is aware that at this year's level of provision, which was well under the level of spend, only £628 million was forfeited, under totally different conditions.

The hon. Member, in seeking to consider next year's rate support grant, made reference to the Social Security Bill, but I think that that is something which should be discussed tomorrow.

With regard to rate capping, the hon. Member asked why a number of Labour authorities appear in the list. The hon. Gentleman is aware—I read out the criteria—that the criteria are clearly designed on levels of spending and levels of increases in spending. The fact that a number of Labour authorities appear in those lists is surely an indictment, if ever an indictment was needed, of the Labour authorities which go in for profligate waste.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the best compliment that the House can pay him is summed up by the lacklustre response of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)? Does my right hon. Friend accept that all prudent councils and all ratepayers of cash-happy councils will welcome his statement this afternoon? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is no coincidence that, of the 20 rate-capped authorities, 19 are Labour-controlled and one, Tower Hamlets, is Liberal-controlled? Does my right hon. Friend further accept that industry and commerce in the inner cities will be grateful for his protection so that they can go about creating jobs and wealth?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is right about the political denomination of the 20 councils I mentioned. However, I must say that that is only a temporary state of affairs and it may not last much longer. The business rate is vital to those of us on this side of the House who are trying to increase employment.

The greatest damage which has been done to employment in large parts of the north of England has been the excessively high business rates which have been levied by local authorities. If this settlement makes a contribution to holding or even reducing the rates in those parts of the country and results in a better climate for business, I shall be proud of its contribution to job creation.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Is the Secretary of State aware that, although the increase of nearly £3 billion is welcome and the fact that the Government have not reduced the grant again below 46·4 per cent. is a consolation to local authorities, they believe that the increase takes account only of inflation during the past few years and will probably not compensate for the increased wages that they will have to pay the police, teachers and other public officers? Although the change in the recycling rules is welcome because it is better for local authorities to have certainty, it is tinged with danger because there is no prospect of gain for any authority which tries to conform with the Secretary of State's guidance. That is a defect of the abolition of recycling. Does the Secretary of State agree that the change from 20 per cent. to 12·5 per cent. above GREA for rate-capped authorities is tightening the screw and that capital controls are the thing which local authorities resent most? They want to be able to spend their capital as they choose and not have the Secretary of State increasingly dictate that they can spend less and less of it.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has to accept that local authorities must be responsible for the wages that they negotiate and the pay of their employees. I cannot be expected to accommodate the public spending rule to whatever they choose to pay. I am glad of his welcome for the abolition of grant recycling. There is a chance of gain this year because, with the increased aggregate Exchequer grant, authorities will get more grant, provided that they do not go and forfeit it by engaging in overspending.

The hon. Gentleman is not alone in welcoming the abolition of grant recycling. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who I see in his place, referred to it on 5 March when he said that it was causing great financial uncertainty in Labour and Conservative authorities alike. I should like to introduce him to the hon. Member for Copeland to see whether they can agree about grant recycling.

I am delighted to be able to help the constituents of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) by rate-capping the borough of Southwark. That will protect his constituents from excessive rate demands which would otherwise have been made. I have not yet announced the result of our consideration of the capital controls system for local authorities.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on what appear to be some encouraging and welcome features in his statement. Is he aware that much of the trouble this year, and all of it in my county, was caused not by the local authority but by the Government setting the taper points for the reduction of grant in totally the wrong place? Will he assure the House that nothing so unjust and ridiculous can possibly happen under the system that he has announced this afternoon?

Mr. Ridley: I was delighted to receive my right hon. Friend only last week, when he brought a delegation from Buckinghamshire to discuss these matters with me. I think that he will agree that much of what he said has been incorporated in the statement. I cannot go further into the effects on individual counties until we have completed the consideration and consultations about GREAs, but in the next statement, at the end of the year, I hope to be able to give much closer exemplifications of the effect on every authority.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Is the Secretary of State aware that the British people will not be fooled by a Conservative Secretary of State in a Government who, when county and district councils were Conservative-controlled, cut rate support grant so that rates were forced up, but who now that nearly every local authority is Labour-controlled or hung, are giving enough RSG to keep rates down? Does he agree that this is a vicious attack on local government? The Secretary of State is giving a so-called extra £1 billion, having taken £17 billion off local authorities during the past seven years, and he will claw most of that £1 billion back and keep it, rather than redistribute it, as happened in previous years. The Government did a calculation last year of how much clawback there would be because of penalties. Has the right hon. Gentleman made that calculation of the money that he will keep this year?

Mr. Ridley: With so many authorities now in the hands of Labour or hung, it is right that the Government should do something to protect the unfortunate ratepayers and victims of those vicious councils. I give notice to the hon. Gentleman and to all councils that after this rate support settlement there will be no excuse for any authority to increase its rates bills by more than a small amount. If such increases occur, they will be the fault of the authorities concerned. The Conservative Government have come to the aid of ratepayers throughout the country, despite the Opposition.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I congratulate my right hon. Friend, first on maintaining the percentage of Government support, particularly unless and until we can spread the load much more fairly, and, secondly, on tackling the abuse of the deferred payment scheme. Is it his assessment that more authorities should have greater funding than at present to enable them to improve the fabric of school buildings, housing, and so on?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The figure of 46·4 per cent. remains and I believe that many authorities will welcome that. I also thank my hon. Friend for his reference to the stopping of abuse of the deferred payment scheme which will save ratepayers immense burdens in the future. It is in the interests of ratepayers that that abuse should be stopped quickly before it gets them into real trouble.

Capital allocations are not the subject of this statement, but I shall be putting forward proposals or making a statement about that aspect at a later stage. The figure, of course, will be covered by the public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. Bernard Conlan (Gateshead, East): Does the Secretary of State recall that the borough of Gateshead has been more than responsible in its budgeting to meet the terms and conditions laid down by the Government? Is it not perverse that an area more deprived than most in terms of education, housing, health care, social services and employment should be treated so badly? Does he agree that it is disgraceful and scandalous that such a responsible authority should be rate-capped?

Mr. Ridley: Gateshead is spending 14 per cent. above GRE. Its spending has increased by 11 per cent. and the local rate by 27 per cent. since 1985-86. Those high-spending performance figures bring the authority within the criteria for rate capping.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend accept that my two excellent district authorities of Lancaster and Wyre, which have scarcely raised rates at all in the past six years, will greatly welcome a settlement that is fair to those who do best?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I confirm exactly what she has said.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): The Secretary of State has made much of increased spending in rate support grant available to local authorities, but will he confirm three points? First, will he confirm that the extra amount is a mere fraction of the amount taken away in the past six years? Secondly, how much of that amount does the Treasury intend to claw back? Thirdly, will he guarantee that, once the entitlements for individual authorities are announced, they will not be altered retrospectively, as is being considered in the case of Southwark?

Mr. Ridley: I acknowledge that the grant percentage has continued to fall under this Government, a process started by the Labour Government, and that it has fallen from 61 per cent. to 46·4 per cent. That has been a deliberate act of policy by the Government to put more of the burden of local spending on local people.

I cannot confirm that there will be any clawback from the grant. It is a realistic settlement and if authorities spend in line with inflation and not above there will be no forfeit of grant at all. That is quite different from the situation last year when it was clear that the provision was less than the likely spending, so there was a heavy forfeit of grant for recycling.

I did not quite follow the hon. Lady's third question, but I assure her that there will be no change in grant entitlement as the year goes on because of the abandonment of recycling.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): In view of the extent of Labour protest about the penalties suffered by authorities which have spent far above their GRE, may we conclude that authorities which spent considerably less will be very favourably treated under the new proposals? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that such authorities will be allowed to spend more to reach their GREs? If they cannot do that, what is the point of having GREs at all?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend will need to study the full details when they are worked out to see the effect on any particular authority, but I confirm that, when an authority makes a budget, it will be able to read off immediately the amount of grant that it will receive for that budget and will be able to maximise its share of the grant by its spending plans. In addition, it should be able to benefit from the increased grant. I believe, therefore, that there is every opportunity for prudent authorities to do better out of this settlement.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): What about Labour councils such as Birmingham which have always spent less than GRE figures but have lost grant this year because the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor referred to notional rather than to actual figures for last year? Will they lose next year as well?

Mr. Ridley: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is referring to events which were brought to a successful and correct conclusion late last night, but Birmingham, like all authorities, must abide by the rules for rate support grant and share equally.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Whatever my right hon. Friend considers to be the right and proper rules, by which Birmingham should abide like everyone else, does he appreciate that cities such as

[Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark]

Birmingham have very special problems? What hope is there for them in this settlement? Are we to get more money or are the slums to continue? Which is it to be?

Mr. Ridley: It depends entirely on how much money Birmingham budgets to spend. If it budgets for this year's spending plus 3·75 per cent. it will maximise its grant take.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Is the Secretary of State aware that official statistics published by the Department show that the London borough of Newham is the second most deprived borough in the country? Is he aware that the local council is wrestling with massive problems, including a terrible housing problem, exacerbated by the need to remove tower blocks like the notorious Ronan Point? Does he agree that on any objective criteria the Government should be granting partnership status to Newham and helping the area, not rate-capping it? Does he agree that decisions about expenditure should be taken locally and decided by local democracy in elections? Is he aware that in the elections immediately following the setting of a rate in Newham Labour won 60 seats of of 60? Is that why he is being so vindictive to Newham?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman cannot be pleased or proud of the figures for Newham, with spending 18 per cent. above GRE, an increase of 19 per cent. since 1985-86 and a local rate which has gone up 66 per cent. above the class average and is 50 per cent. higher than in 1982-83. Any authority with a record like that would be wiser to keep quiet.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be received with relief and considerable satisfaction by most local authorities, although their ability to achieve low rate increases will clearly depend on the level of wage increases? Will my right hon. Friend continue to bear very much in mind the problems of traditional low-spending authorities which have little or no waste remaining to be cut out but which wish and are required to provide an adequate level of public service?

Mr. Ridley: I believe that authorities of the type that my hon. Friend has described will find that they can accommodate the spending that they need with aid from the Government as a result of this settlement. I commend the settlement to my hon. Friend, because it recognises the very point about past rate support grant settlements that he has been making with such persistence.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the Secretary of State accept that, in the past seven years, we have seen a process of centralisation of local government power in the hands of the Secretary of State and that rate increases in most of the inner urban areas, particularly in inner London, have largely been due to cuts in the rate support grant? How are inner London local authorities supposed to maintain very important services such as social services and meet the legitimate aspirations that have been democratically decided upon by their people if they are placed within the confines of a central Government straitjacket, the like of which has never been seen before?

Mr. Ridley: I shall give the hon. Gentleman a straight answer. Islington rent arrears are running at 16 per cent. As that authority is short of money, why cannot it collect that rent and spend the money on these more important purposes?

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does the Secretary of State accept that there will be considerable satisfaction in counties such as Lincolnshire at this settlement, in that, because there is a realistic assessment of next year's likely budget and there has been no decrease in the Treasury grant, it should be possible to keep rates at their present level? Will he consider one point? In counties such as Lincolnshire, which are spending below their GREs, there is as yet no provision to uplift spending towards their GREs without grant penalties. Will my right hon. Friend consider whether such a facility can be extended to such counties?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. It will be possible for counties such as his, and many others like it, to be able to maintain their present level of services in real terms by zero or very small increases in rates if they do not go in for an overspending rush. We shall have to look at the details for each county as they come in, but this settlement is designed to enable counties such as Lincolnshire to achieve just that result.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): When the figures show that rate-capped authorities such as Basildon, Lewisham and Greenwich are budgeting this year, despite the limits, to increase their spending over last year by anything up to 25 per cent., how can the Secretary of State claim that rate capping is protecting the ratepayers of those authorities?

Mr. Ridley: Far be it from me to tell the hon. Gentleman about events in his constituency, but he knows full well that, had it not been for rate capping, Greenwich would have had very much higher rates than it has now. There are various ways in which some authorities have sought to evade the effects of rate capping, which will cumulatively catch up with them in the end.

Mr. J. E. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the £1·25 billion available for teachers' pay is still in place? Will he further confirm that it will be subject to the conditions announced at the time by our right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) when he was Secretary of State for Education and Science?

Mr. Ridley: I can confirm that this settlement does not include any allowance for the increase in teachers' pay which may or may not be approved by the Government depending upon the ACAS process. The £1,250 million was offered to the local authorities in return for improvements in the way in which the teaching forces managed in order to improve educational standards. When the ACAS process is complete, the Government will consider the outcome in full and decide whether the release of all the £1,250 million is justified.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): When will the Secretary of State accept that the really irresponsible action has been that of the Government? How can the Government blame local authorities when those authorities have been robbed of millions of pounds? For example, Sheffield has lost more than £240 million in grants and has received a measly £20 million, despite the fact that all the problems remain. The Government may take the money away, but while the problems remain, the caring will continue. I am convinced that, had this Government been in power many years ago, the good Samaritan would have been shot for irresponsibility.

Mr. Ridley: Under this settlement, Sheffield has an opportunity to mend its ways, and I should have thought that it would have been grateful.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): Will my right hon. Friend therefore explain why Sheffield was not rate-capped last year? Is he satisfied that the budget it submitted to escape rate-capping was false, because last January we were threatened with 70 per cent. increases? Will he now confirm that the £33 million a year which Sheffield is borrowing from French banks will be stopped forthwith, because ratepayers — whether householders, commerce or industry — will welcome such action in relation to a council that has not run its affairs properly?

Mr. Ridley: Sheffield was not selected last year, because it did not meet the criteria. This year it does meet the criteria. We operate strictly in accordance with the criteria, and I cannot pick or choose within or without those criteria.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): How will the right hon. Gentleman's statement help those who are unemployed in Middlesbrough, and how will it help the impoverishment of the town by general Tory economic policies since 1979 by depriving that town of the wherewithal to raise the money to meet its needs? No doubt the Secretary of State will quote a series of figures, but let me quote to him a litany of sad and tragic facts — 28 per cent. unemployment, with 98 per cent. unemployment in certain areas. How will the right hon. Gentleman's statement help the town? Is he merely another of these high-ranking Tories who are full of hypocrisy towards the town and have no generosity of spirit?

Mr. Ridley: I must tell the hon. Gentleman in all sincerity that Middlesbrough has had a local rate that is 89 per cent. above the average for its class, and spending per head has been 119 per cent. above the class average. Figures such as those — I say this seriously — result in crushing burdens on business, which in turn cause unemployment. The hon. Gentleman quoted unemployment. Has he yet realised that there is a very strong link between these profligate rate policies and unemployment, and does he now see how rate capping can even be a contribution towards helping the prosperity of his own town?

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): While I warmly welcome the statement, I return to the point made by my hon. Friends the Members for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) and for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern). Does my right hon. Friend agree that the present formula simply does not take into account those local authorities that have very rapid growth? We are so far behind that we need some means of catching up.

Mr. Ridley: I was pleased to discuss these matters with my hon. Friend when he came to see me. He will take some comfort from the fact that we were able to help him over the problem of the new town of Milton Keynes in his constituency. I do not believe that it would be possible to base GREs on expected increases in population, as he suggested, as it would also be necessary to base them on expected decreases in population, which would be too difficult to achieve. But we are constantly listening to what he and his hon. Friends say, and I hope he will think that we have gone a long way to helping them in this rate grant settlement.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Today's grants announcement is designed to be equivalent to a projected inflation figure next year that will, in the right hon. Gentleman's words, produce a standstill in the rates. Will not the announcement produce a standstill in the conditions of misery that are experienced in Coventry and other cities throughout the country? Coventry will still have 1,000 council houses unfit for human habitation and 6,000 private and council houses without toilets or hot and cold running water. It will still have 14,000 houses each of which will need repair and modernisation amounting to £4,500. We do not need a statement such as this or even a change of Minister — we need a change of Government who will restore the money to local authorities so that they can bring the housing and other conditions of working people up to the level that they ought to be.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman displays his usual ignorance. The refurbishment of housing is a capital responsibility, not part of the rate support grant. Coventry could well help itself by making sure that its rent fund allowed for the proper repair and maintenance of its houses rather than resulting in large amounts of dereliction because of its own neglect. If the hon. Gentleman really cares about the people of Coventry, he will be looking forward to the election of a Conservative council there.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): While I welcome the abolition of grant recycling, which returned to Leicester more than £200,000 after it was rate-capped and, therefore, did not qualify for it, why has Leicester city not been included in those which should be rate-capped? Two years ago it was rate-capped and since then it has continued to waste ratepayers' money. The council has just made an 80 per cent. rate rise and is showing no regard for ratepayers and the decent people of Leicester.

Mr. Ridley: I must say to my hon. Friend, although I know that he is a staunch advocate of ratepayers in Leicester, that Leicester does not come within the criteria which I set out, so it would be wrong to include it.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the Secretary of State recognise that Leicester city council is struggling to meet great problems of deprivation and that his statement paid practically no regard to the duties of local authorities to care for people in need and to the services which they provide? Does he recognise that the words "democratic accountability", which he used, in the local authority context mean the accountability of councils to those who elect them, and that he and the Government continue to remove that accountability?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. and learned Gentleman must also bear in mind the accountability of councils to those who find the money which they spend. That is something which one never hears from the Opposition Benches. If local authorities spend £25·2 billion in 1987-88, they will be spending more than a quarter of total public expenditure, which is an extremely large sum.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must take into account the subsequent business on the Order Paper today, which is extremely heavy. I shall allow questions to continue for a further 10 minutes, which will give a full hour for the statement. That is rather longer than usual.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): While I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and the general gist of what he said, does he accept that some Conservative Members are deeply worried about responsible, prudent but expanding authorities which have been penalised under successive rate support grant announcements over recent years? Will he give a categorical assurance that authorities which have obeyed the Government to the letter will in no way be penalised by this settlement? Although it is not a major part of the statement, will he reassure us that the limitations on the spending of capital receipts will be relaxed for responsible authorities which want to use the money to build specialist accommodation, particularly for the elderly?

Mr. Ridley: I have not dealt with capital receipts today. They will have to be the subject of further study before we can make an announcement. On my hon. Friend's first point, I have tried to design the settlement with the sort of views and objectives he has in mind, but it is never possible for a rate support grant settlement to be wholly acceptable to every authority. However, within that constraint this will prove to be a settlement with which authorities can live and provide a decent level of service.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Is not one of the most blatant cases of political bias revealed in rate-capping Brent? When it was Labour-controlled it was rate-capped. Last year there was a Tory authority which left behind a series of repairs to be done on school buildings and a whole log jam of work to be done. The council is now Labour-controlled and has again been rate-capped. Is the Secretary of State aware that each week my ratepayers spend £30,000 on bed-and-breakfast accommodation for 650 homeless families, that 18,000 people are on the waiting list for housing, that our social services have made the news throughout the country, that 52 per cent. of the population fall into ethnic minority groups, and that 80 per cent. of our school leavers are black and in July will go straight on to the dole? We are urban-aided, but is it not nonsense to give urban aid with one hand and to rate-cap with the other?

Mr. Ridley: Is it not nonsense to have 36 per cent. rent arrears in the borough of Brent? Would it not be a useful source of income if the council at least collected its rent and spent the money on the purposes to which the hon. Gentleman rightly draws attention?

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): My right hon. Friend will be aware that by far the largest proportion of any local authority's budget is that spent on wages and salaries. In that context, does he agree that there is a great responsibility on those who negotiate increases in wages and salaries to ensure that more local authority resources can be spent at the sharp end rather than on wages and salaries? Does my right hon. Friend agree that no local authority should accept a generous settlement merely to employ additional staff when all local authorities should be economising on the number of staff?

Mr. Ridley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is no excuse to hide behind the fact that local authorities have chosen to negotiate a number of wages and salaries centrally, because, if they do that, they must take account of the cost of those settlements.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Having rate-capped a large number of inner city partnerhips and programme authorities, which is bad enough, what is the point of penalising those authorities if they spend within the resources available to them, and of preventing them from spending on capital projects when at the same time the Department, in a statement on urban programmes, is encouraging local authorities to take inner-city partnership schemes into their main stream and to spend on capital? What is the logic of the Government's programme on inner cities?

Mr. Ridley: I must confine the statement to the rate support grant. The hon. Gentleman includes matters which deal with capital control and public expenditure provision of capital. I cannot yet discuss that.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): While I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, will he take into account the fact that both his immediate predecessors told my authority that, in return for a bad settlement, there would be a better one next time, and that that has now happened two years in a row? Can Solihull expect to be lucky the third time?

Mr. Ridley: Not a bit of it. My predecessors' promises have been fulfilled.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Will the Secretary of State concede that the principal reason for the savage rate increases over the past two years is that the Tory Government have removed £17 billion in rate support grant from local authorities, and that it has little to do with so-called profligate local authorities? Does he agree that, if his statement that there should be no rate increases is not to be dismissed as pernicious propaganda, he must acknowledge that that will depend on the circumstances of individual authorities and such factors as the rate of inflation and the level of wage and salary increases, especially for teachers? Is he aware——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Two questions is plenty.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must look at the spending figures. During the past five years total local authority current spending has grown by 38 per cent. in cash terms, which is 7 per cent. in real terms. It is not merely a question of who is finding the money. There has been massive growth in the total spent, as those figures prove. Before an agreement is reached on teachers' salaries between the Government and other parties, we must see the nature of the agreement with ACAS. The Government have not yet been shown that. I must reiterate the conditions of that, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) has made clear to the House in the past.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that, if local authorities such as East Sussex continue to be as prudent as they were last year and in previous years, they will benefit even more next year?

Mr. Ridley: As my hon. Friend knows, I cannot give the details for every county council, but the settlement is designed to provide a good level of grant. Providing that authorities do not increase their spending above the rate of inflation, they should be able to manage with zero or small rate increases.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the help that Bradford will receive from central Government in real terms as a result of the settlement will remain the same? Will he come to Bradford, or receive a delegation from Bradford, so that he can consider urgently the need for additional money to deal with our housing and education crises and inner-city decay?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot comment on the precise effects on individual authorities, as I have said to all hon. Members who have asked me that sort of question. I can say that the settlement will enable authorities to achieve a proper level of services without large rate increases.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): My right hon. Friend's statement will be welcomed especially by careful authorities such as my own. Will he accept that authorities such as Gillingham are worried about the contortions and distortions of the system which allowed two years ago for Gillingham to be in penalty, when it was spending 49 per cent. of its GRE, while this year it has not had to raise a rate at all, due to the munificence of my right hon. Friend's immediate predecessor?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I think that the changes that I have announced today will have a considerable effect in simplifying the system and making it easier for authorities, ratepayers and electors to understand what is happening.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Will the Secretary of State break the habit of a lifetime by giving the Chamber a straight answer to a straight question and so allow hon. Members fully to appreciate the level of cunning and slyness in his ploy and its presentation this afternoon? Will he give an undertaking that the total GRE will equal the total running expenditure and that there will be no unallocated margin?

Mr. Ridley: I can give the hon. Gentleman a straight answer—no.

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents who are ratepayers and who live in the Basildon district council area will be pleased by the announcement that Basildon is to be rate-capped for the third successive year? Is he aware also that ratepayers in my constituency and ratepayers everywhere will be indebted to him for the action that he will be taking from midnight tonight on the advance and deferred purchase schemes?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The spending of his authority is 97 per cent. above GREA and spending per head is 99·9 per cent. above the class average. I am sure that he and his constituents will be grateful for the action that is being taken. The second part of my hon. Friend's question was addressed to deferred purchase. The leader of Islington council, Ms. Hodge, is engaged in one of these schemes to the extent of £38 million. In a newspaper report, she is alleged to have said:

"This is a high risk strategy, because not only does it depend on a change in government but it also depends on a commitment by the Labour Front Bench to bail us out when they return to power."

The Leader of the Opposition is in his place and he can give such a commitment. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to give such a commitment this afternon to bail out his friend in Islington. But I doubt whether he will ever be in a position to deliver.

Several Hon. Members rose

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope to be able to call all hon. Members who have been rising in their places to put a question to the Secretary of State for the Environment. When that has been done, we must move on. I ask for one question from each Member and for brief replies.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The Secretary of State has said that the London borough of Newham is spending 18 per cent. over its GREA and will be rate-capped. The City of London spends 190 per cent. over its GREA but it is not being rate-capped. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise how deeply offensive it is to describe the spending programme of Newham as profligate when it is surrounded by massive social and economic problems? Will he emerge from behind the Dispatch Box and his prepared statement and come to Newham to see things for himself?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that only authorities that fall within the criteria can be selected for rate limitation. The authorities which I have read out are the ones that fall within that criteria.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Surely what is grossly misleading is the present system which penalises low-spending authorities by rewarding high-spending Labour authorities? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, with the welcome demise of recycling from low-spending shires to cities, the ratepayers of Lincolnshire, who have a low-spending authority, will never again be faced with high rate increases as long as we have the present Government, committed as they are to this reform, and as long as they re-elect Conservative county councillors?

Mr. Ridley: I think that I can confirm what my hon. Friend seeks, but I cannot commit my successors on the Government Benches as future Secretaries of State for the Environment.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Secretary of State aware that those outside the House will have understood what the statement is all about? They will understand that it is balanced on a piece of election elastic. That is why he has not been able to answer some of the questions which have been put to him. It seems that the statement has been made because there might be an early 1987 election. Is it not a double standard for the Government——

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Skinner: It is brief.

Is it not a double standard to tell local authorities that they cannot be involved in rescheduling their debts when at the same time, or two or three years ago, the Government told the banks in Britain that they could reschedule debts to Argentina? They told them as well that if they managed to get a default upon the payment of these debts, they would be relieved of the requirement to pay taxation upon the debts. There is one law for the banks in Britain, which have been relieved of the requirement to pay taxation, and another for local authorities that provide public services to help the people in their areas, who are being hammered by the Government. There is one law for the bankers and another for local authorities.

Mr. Tony Banks: A Government of shysters.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman is in scintillating form this afternoon. The entire House will be impressed by his immense financial expertise.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): As my right hon. Friend will be aware, due to the financial good sense of the previous Tory administration of Gloucestershire county council it has received a £5 million refund this year. However, it is now a hung council and the £5 million has not been redistributed among the ratepayers. Does my right hon. Friend think it in order for Gloucestershire ratepayers to look forward to a rate reduction next year?

Mr. Ridley: I am glad that my hon. Friend brings in the county which he, I and others represent. I can tell him that this year Gloucestershire county council, under Liberal-Labour control, forfeited £4·3 million of grant and received £4·8 million in grant from the recycling mechanism, which seems to be an odd reward for overspending. The only way to remedy this is for a change of control of the council.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Will the Secretary of State tell the House what his credentials are for understating the extent of the real poverty that now exists in inner-city areas? Will this statement make any real difference to the mean life which the Government have inflicted on my constituents and those of many of my right hon. and hon. Friends?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman says that there is poverty in his constituency. That poverty can be made worse only by having high rates and taking money away from those who are suffering poverty. He has still not grasped the point that there is great benefit in reducing the burdens which authorities such as that in his constituency are placing upon the poorest in society.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): The prospect of low or zero rate rises will be welcomed by employers in Norwich and by ratepayers generally. Can my right hon. Friend confirm that we are moving towards a system that will reward low spenders and to a far simpler system that will be free of the sort of gobbledegook which we have had to tolerate for so long?

Mr. Ridley: I hope that authorities will find that they can manage with zero or low rate increases if they keep their spending roughly in line with inflation. I hope also that my statement will make the system a little easier to understand, though I confess that it is still extremely complex.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the treatment of Norfolk county council in recent years has been harsh and unfair and that it is not its fault that this year has seen large rate increases? Will he accept that his statement will be most welcome, and will he give a categorical assurance to Norfolk ratepayers that he means business when he says that he is determined to improve the lot of prudent shire counties?

Mr. Ridley: I hope that what I have done will have that effect. I cannot, of course, forecast what will happen in future.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it needs to be said time and time again that if there is a rate increase next year in counties such as Oxfordshire it will be due entirely to the profligate spending policies of the Labour and SDP parties, whose only hobby seems to be a wish to write cheques on other people's bank accounts?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend has the point exactly right. I can add only that what he has said does not apply solely to counties such as Oxfordshire. It applies to every county and district throughout the land. If there are to be rate increases, the public must know full well that the blame must lie fairly and squarely upon the authority concerned.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The Secretary of State told my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) that he was not planning to increase the slope. How, then, does he intend to implement the statement that he has made today, that he will increase the penalty for the reckless? In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), the right hon. Gentleman has now admitted that GREAs may well be set well below the level of aggregate expenditure. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will confirm that, if that is so, he will be putting into the settlement a mechanism by which he could claw back up to the £1 billion that he says that he is giving to the local authorities. How much is the Treasury budgeting to claw back from the local authorities? Is it not the message of the settlement that, after suffering seven years of assault, local authorities should beware of Conservative Ministers bearing gifts? While the rhetoric of the settlement has about it all the stench of the pre-election pork barrel, it will in reality do precious little to meet the social and economic consequences of the Government's actions and the poverty and hardship that they have produced, or to commence rebuilding of Britain that is the task that we shall inherit.

Mr. Ridley: I hope that, if the hon. Gentleman inherits anything, he will do his homework and get it right. He has not got it right. The penalty for reckless authorities is the abolition of grant recycling.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman does not understand the system.

Mr. Ridley: I understand the system very much better than the hon. Gentleman. If a local authority loses grant on the present slopes, that grant is forfeited and goes back to the Treasury. However, since the grant and the provision are set at a realistic level, no authority need lose grant, nor do we expect any authority to lose grant unless it goes in for a wild bonanza. For that reason, we do not expect any grant recycle to be forfeited. The hon. Gentleman must make up his mind whether what I have announced is a cheat or a pe-election bribe. It cannot be both.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take points of order later.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take points of order after the Standing Order No. 10 application. That is the normal procedure.

Later

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the statement made by the Secretary of State for the Environment on the rate support grant for England, he constantly referred to the levels of rent arrears in various boroughs. Is it in order for the right hon. Gentleman deliberately to mislead the House about rent arrears when they are the responsibility of the Department of Health and Social Security?

Mr. Speaker: No hon. Member, whether from the Front Bench or the Back Benches, deliberately misleads the House. The hon. Gentleman seems to be seeking to raise a point for debate. As I understand it, there will have to be an order on this matter, and so there will be a debate. I shall bear the hon. Gentleman's claims in mind when we come to that point.

NEW MEMBER

The following Member took and subscribed the Oath

Mrs. Llinos Golding, for Newcastle-under-Lyme.

Nigel Duncan Williams

4.44 pm

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the proposed release from prison on parole of Nigel Duncan Williams."

I believe that we should consider the basis upon which violent criminals are released from prison on remitted sentences and especially on parole. In particular, I ask that we be allowed to debate the interests of the victims families, who are affected by released prisoners returning to the local area.

In April, four years ago, Nigel Duncan Williams of Whitestone crescent, Bodmin, stood charged, with murder. He was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to 12 years in prison. He had lain in wait for and had brutally assaulted, Caroline Cooper of my constituency, who died from her injuries. He then dragged her into the churchyard. Four years ago this month, on appeal, his sentence was reduced to eight years. Next Tuesday Nigel Williams is to be released on parole, to return to Bodmin and live round the corner from the victim's family, close to the very place where the crime took place.

This state of affairs is horrific for the locality and in particular for the Cooper family, who have another daughter now aged 15.

The issue is not restricted to one family and one convicted criminal. In the statement made by the Home Secretary in 1983 about the conditions upon which parole was to be given to violent criminals, and in the subsequent report ordered to be published by this House on 3 June this year, many points are made about the close consideration to be given to the parole of violent prisoners. However, there is no reference in either the statement or the report to the interests of the victim's families.

I ask that urgent consideration be given to this issue by the House. In the case to which I have referred, some four years and two months after his conviction, a violent criminal is to return to the very locality of his crime and the neighbourhood of the affected family.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the proposed release from prison on parole of Nigel Duncan Williams."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

I will now take the points of order.

Wages Bill

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I wish to raise a point of order on a matter of which I have given prior notice.

Together with several of my Labour comrades I sat for many weeks on Standing Committee K, considering the Wages Bill, which is to come before the House tomorrow, after the Social Security Bill and the Social Security Regulations, and after the clotted cream and strawberries have been served at a wedding that I understand is to take place.

There are strict conventions governing what we are allowed to discuss tomorrow night. For instance, we are only allowed to discuss the amendments made to the Bill in the House of Lords. I should have liked to be able to table amendments to those Lords amendments and to put them before the House tomorrow evening. However, the Lords are not debating the Third Reading of the Wages Bill until tonight. The Vote Office can provide no information about what has been discussed so far or what changes might be made tonight on Third Reading.

I should like to quote from the Report of the Select Committee on Procedure of 1984-85:

> "If Parliament is adequately to scrutinise legislation and to have time to improve it, we believe it is essential that (emergencies excepted) reasonable periods are allowed for reflection and for consultation. We propose that the following intervals be laid down in Standing Orders as the minimum between various stages of a Bill:
> (a) two weekends between first and second reading;
> (b) ten days between second reading and the start of committee stage; and
> (c) ten days between report from committee and the start of Report stage."

We shall have barely 10 hours after the Lords finish with the Bill before it returns to the Commons. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to protect the 3 million workers who are to lose either holidays or legal minimum wages under the Bill, and to protect the rights of hon. Members adequately to analyse legislation and to consult those affected before we speak in the Chamber. May we either have advice on how to delay consideration of the Bill or have the recess delayed for at least two weeks so that we can do the job that our electors sent us here to do?

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As one who sat through the Standing Committee which considered the Wages Bill, may I put it to you and the House that this is an involved, complicated and technically difficult Bill which is not easy to understand? Indeed, for most of the time, the Minister in charge of the Committee found great difficulty in understanding the Bill. When he was forced to depart from the bits of paper that his advisers gave him, he flopped around because he did not understand it.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that we shall not have the Lords amendments until tomorrow morning and that that is grossly unfair. There are many interests involved. The Low Pay Unit, a public institution, is very much involved. It has taken a great interest in the Bill. It will be impossible to consult it in the few hours that are available. Many trade unions are involved, as is the Equal Opportunities Commission. This is an abuse of the procedures of the House and I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will be kind enough, as you always are, to give some thought to the matter.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you also bear in mind, when considering the point of order, the shabby way in which the Government have treated hon. Members during the passage of the Bill? On numerous occasions in Committee I and other hon. Members protested because Hansard was not available to enable members of the Committee to consider the Minister's speeches. It was pointed out that because there were 10 Standing Committees at that time the printers could not print Hansard in time. The Hansard staff were not at fault.

In addition, the Government amended part III during the passage of the Bill which brought forward the redundancy payment scheme. The reason given was that the Government intended to take another £50 million out of the redundancy fund — a fund incidentally, which is contributed to by employers and employers in Britain. Nevertheless, the Government wanted to steal an extra £50 million. That is the way that the Government have treated the Bill during its passage through the House.

I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will bear in mind what my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East, (Mr. Nellist) said about amendments not being available for hon. Members to consider until tomorrow because the other place is having the Third Reading debate today, during which amendments can be tabled.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that you will appreciate that my hon. Friends have a real and serious point. We shall have amendments which, as yet, we can only speculate on, and which will be of profound importance to many of our constituents. Yet not only shall we not see them, but, unless you are willing to help in some way, there seems at the moment to be no way in which we shall be able to amend the amendments in time. Therefore, we would appreciate your guidance on that. However, I emphasise that, whatever arrangement you make, for which we shall be grateful, we still regard them as a poor substitute for the proper consideration that the legislation should have had.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the difficulty in which the House finds itself, and I thank the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) for having given notice of the point of order. He and the House will know that I am not responsible for the organisation of business; that is a matter which would be best discussed through the usual channels.

The timing of the business and the fact that the House is due to go into recess this weekend is in the hands of the House. I fully recognise the difficulties in which hon. Members have been placed in this matter and I shall bear that in mind when I make my selection.

Mr. Nellist: Further to my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that I can help the hon. Gentleman any more.

Mr. Nellist: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for having helped in the way that you have done so far. However, did I correctly understand the latter part of your remarks to mean that if amendments were tabled tomorrow as a result of tonight's Third Reading in the other place, the normal convention of a couple of days' notice would be set aside so that Labour Members could table amendments? Secondly, through you, Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the House is listening, may I appeal to the Leader of the House to say whether he has anything to say about the position in which we will find ourselves tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: I shall consider starred amendments, and I might, if time is short, have to consider manuscript amendments. We do not know what will happen, but I shall consider the matter carefully.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I am sure that the House will appreciate your concern, Mr. Speaker, to help us in the way in which amendments are selected. The arrangements for dealing with the Bill are, of course, far less than ideal, but they are by no means unprecedented. If the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) would like to do just a little homework, he will find that taking the Commons consideration of Lords' amendments the day after the Bill leaves the other place is by no means unprecedented. For example, the Social Security (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, completed its passage in the other place on Wednesday 23 March 1977 — a significant date — and was considered by the Commons on Thursday 24 March.

South Africa (Sanctions)

4.57 pm

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the application of the Nassau Accord in relation to sanctions against South Africa.

The accord was agreed in October 1985 and it had three main areas of action. First, there was the immediate application of limited sanctions — in fact, to coin the Prime Minister's words when she reported to the House, teeny-weeny sanctions.

The second area of action was that an Eminent Persons Group of seven should be set up whose terms of reference were clearly laid down in the accord. They were charged with the responsibility of bringing back to the Commonwealth Heads of State conference a full report within six months. The timetable was subsequently altered to about nine months.

I am sure that all hon. Members are au fait with the contents of the Eminent Persons Group's report. I want to quote the penultimate paragraph of the conclusions of that report, which gives the House an overwhelming reason for supporting the Bill. It says:

"The question in front of Heads of Government is in our view clear. It is not whether such measures will compel change; it is already the case that their absence and Pretoria's belief that they need not be feared, defers change. Is the Commonwealth to stand by and allow the cycle of violence to spiral? Or will it take concerted action of an effective kind? Such action may offer the last opportunity to avert what could be the worse bloodbath since the Second World War."

Thirdly, the accord outlined a further eight points which should be taken into account if adequate progress had not been made in nine months. Those eight points should be spelt out because that, no more and no less, is what I am asking the House to endorse this afternoon and to put into formal legislation. They are: a ban on air links with South Africa; a ban on new investment or reinvestment of profits earned in South Africa; a ban on the import of agricultural products from South Africa; the termination of double taxation agreements with South Africa; the termination of all Government assistance to investment in and trade with, South Africa; a ban on all Government procurement in South Africa; a ban on Government contracts with majority-owned South African companies, and, last but by no means least, a ban on the promotion of tourism to South Africa.

Those were the eight points that were set out in the Nassau accord. Many of us believe that they are minimal and want full mandatory economic sanctions to be applied to South Africa, and I believe that the House must make a decision this afternoon in the light of the developing situation in South Africa.

As we all know, the situation in South Africa is deteriorating daily. Calls for the application of sanctions as a means of ensuring that the Pretoria regime gets round the negotiating table with the true leaders of the people of South Africa are almost universal. The South African Council of Churches, the trade union movement, Bishop Tutu, Nelson Mandela, and, as we reported last week in the South Africa debate, some business men, are now calling for sanctions to be applied. Outside South Africa, many nations are asking for action to be taken. The Synod of the Church of England, Archbishop Runcie, and the United States Congress have called for sanctions against South Africa, and during the past two or three days two white members of the Commonwealth, including the Canadian all-party committee on human rights, have asked for broad economic sanctions to be applied from 30 September 1986. If agreement is not arrived at by the Commonwealth heads of Government, there are calls for Canada to go it alone.

The Australian Prime Minister, in a special appeal to the British Prime Minister, said:

"I can only express the hope that the developing attitudes around the world will impress themselves upon those who have to make the decisions in London when we meet there in a very short time . . . and I hope these events are becoming clear to the British Prime Minister."

The most significant movement over the past few days has come from British industry. It was reported in the press on Sunday, and was followed up yesterday, that the British Industry Committee on South Africa, which includes 50 of the largest British companies operating in South Africa, has changed its position and is now calling for limited sanctions. Why has it done this?

Its change of position has been caused by the slogan that is going the rounds in Africa and elsewere, "Buy British Last". That has caused the change in attitude in British business.

The options before the House are now clear. Do we support the vast majority of the Commonwealth, the overwhelming majority of the South African people, all the front-line states, the Church inside and outside South Africa, and, latterly, many parts of the business community? Or do we reject this near universal concensus in slavish adherence to the British Prime Minister, whose credibility sinks daily at home and abroad in that she says that sanctions will hurt the blacks?

For 100 years the blacks in South Africa have been struggling to be free. Over the past 50 years, since the Nationalist Government was formed, apartheid has been written into the constitution. In rural areas, the blacks have one of the highest infant mortality rates, at 500 per 1,000, of any country with a comparable GDP. South Africa is one of the worst countries in the world in that respect. Spending on education is balanced to one in favour of the whites. There is one doctor for every 300 whites, but only one doctor for every 12,000 blacks.

The blacks in South Africa have been suffering for years and they are calling for help. The Government have not heeded that call. The Prime Minister turned her back on the Brandt report, and her conduct towards the Third world in aid has been nothing less than deplorable. It is unacceptable for the Prime Minister to lecture us about the suffering of the South African people and claim that sanctions will cost Britain jobs.

The Prime Minister's claims have a hollow ring, both inside and outside the House, as there are 4 million people unemployed in this country and there are even some doubts about how the unemployment figures are calculated. The Tory Benches must take note of the major companies in the United Kingdom, which, in response to the slogan "Buy British Last" have said that not imposing sanctions could be extremely costly for the United Kingdom, if not in the short term, certainly in the long term—[Interruption.] I am trying to make myself heard.

The House has a special responsibility in the matter. In 1909 it passed the constitution Act for the Union of South Africa. This is possibly the only constitution based on racism, as racism is inherent in the Act. There was some opposition to the Act, but we have a responsibility now not to drag our heels on this issue. We must take the lead, bearing in mind that that constitution derived from this House of Commons and that the racist regime of apartheid was built into that constitution.

An interesting letter appeared in The Times on 27 July 1909. It said:

"We of European birth or descent are, by virtue of our civilisation, undoubtedly dominant; we shall, if we deserve it, remain dominant, but only in so far as we recognise and perform the duties which our privileged position entails. Our dominance must be dominance of merit in a free country, where career is open to talent and to civilised men,"—

this may refer to Conservative Members—

"with no discrimination upon such unsound, unstable grounds of race or colour."

The point of that letter to The Times, written nearly 100 years ago, is relevant to the House in 1986. Discussions are necessary. Will this House, in 1986, have integrity, humanity and compassion and act in concert with the Commonwealth and approve my Bill this afternoon? The Bill will signal to South Africa and to the Commonwealth that we mean business and that we will attack the apartheid regime.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): In this House we know how frequently private Members' Bills are used as publicity stunts. Because we understand that, we do not normally wish to waste too much time on them. Indeed, we often let them pass on the nod. This practice is not so generally understood outside the House.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) is a member of the national executive committee of the Anti-Apartheid Movement. His arguments are familiar to us and I do not need to spend time on them now. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) was heard in relative silence. We have freedom of speech in this place.

Mr. Onslow: The hon. Gentleman cannot persuade me that if his Bill is allowed an unopposed passage today it will not be trumpeted around the world by the Anti-Apartheid Movement as a major setback for the Government and their policies. It becomes all the more obvious that that would be so when we remember, as the hon. Gentleman did not remind us, that the Foreign Secretary sets off today on the second stage of his South African mission.

We all know the case against apartheid, and we are united in this House and elsewhere in the country in our opposition to that abhorrent system. At the same time, we should also be united in wishing the Foreign Secretary success in achieving the objectives that he has set. If his mission is ultimately unsuccessful—as I hope it will not be—we know that then will be the time to consider with our partners in the European Community and in the Commonwealth, and with our friends in the West, what measures should be taken.

The Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have made that clear time and again. In the meantime, it does no one any good to join the Leader of the Opposition—who is such a great boy for the bombastic cliché—in talking about "using sanctions to bring Botha to heel."

Whatever the armchair guerrillas may say, the imposition of sanctions is not an end in itself. Our end and our aim must be a peaceful settlement in South Africa, not the promotion of violence and death.

The House today should give its full support, therefore, to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in his very difficult task. We must not weaken his hand by suggesting that we believe that he can intimidate or blackmail Pretoria into submission. We should reject this thoroughly mischievous and unhelpful measure.

Orders of the Day

Education Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Before the House begins consideration of the Bill I should draw attention to a printer's error affecting amendments Nos. 117 and 118. These amendments are printed today in the correct order, having been transposed yesterday. However, names intended for the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), amendment No. 118, have been added to the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), amendment No. 117. This error is regretted, but Mr. Speaker was aware of it when he made the provisional selection of amendments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): On a point of order that relates to the very heavy business for tonight, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have all seen Mr. Speaker's provisional selection of amendments. You will appreciate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that some of them relate to very important matters. There is a substantive debate on amendment No. 153 about corporal punishment, and there will be substantive debates on special schools, transport to schools in rural areas and the closure of schools procedure.

Many hon. Members and especially those from rural areas will wish to speak on all those matters. It is highly unsatisfactory that the debate on such important matters should be held very late tonight. I should like to raise with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and through you with my right hon. and hon. Friends the possibility of not requiring the House to consider such matters late tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has my sympathy but it is not a matter for me.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Further to that point of order, this is a most important and complicated Bill. Could my hon. Friend the Minister give an undertaking that additional time will be found to discuss the Bill at a later date?

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): I am always anxious to be helpful on Tuesdays. We had a good and constructive Committee stage on the Bill, and in the light of that we would like to make as much progress tonight as possible. However, one has to look at these things philosophically and if we cannot complete matters tonight I hope that we shall be able to do so when the House comes back in October. We shall have plenty of time then to accomplish that. We shall make such progress as we can during the course of the evening.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): The Minister has clearly said that if we do not make progress tonight it would not be beyond the bounds of possibility for the House to discuss these matters after the summer recess. Since that is the case why do we have to go on so late this evening?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I have said, that is not a matter for me.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I should like to correct something in Hansard because it appears that I inadvertently misled the House by talking about the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Bagier) instead of the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay). I was discussing Mr. Speaker's ruling on sartorial elegance and I should never wish to confuse those two hon. Gentlemen. May I have the record corrected and may I apologise to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that that will be noted.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If we do not finish the business tonight and if after the recess the Government decide that there shall be further debate on this important Bill, will it be in order for the Government at that stage to bring forward further amendments?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall deal with that when we come to it.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before the Minister speaks to new clauses 18 and 12 may I seek your advice? New clause 18 is an admirable one and gives us almost exactly half of that for which we asked. There is no way that we can vote against clause 18, but we should like to move new clause 12 separately. In a substantial number of new clauses and amendments the Government have gone some way towards meeting the Opposition, and it will be impossible to oppose those amendments. May I have your ruling on whether we might move new clause 12 separately and have a separate vote on it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall consider that when we reach the appropriate stage.

Ordered.

That the Education Bill [Lords], as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, new Clauses Nos. 18 and 19, Amendments relating to Clauses Nos. 44 and 45, other new Clauses, Amendments and Motions relating to Clauses Nos. 1 to 43 and 46 to 61, new Schedules and Amendments to Schedules. [Mr. Chris Patten.]

New Clause 18

ACCESS TO PAPERS ETC. OF GOVERNING BODIES

'(1) The Secretary of State may make regulations requiring the governing body

(a) of every county, voluntary and maintained special school; and

(b) of every institution of a kind mentioned in section 56 of this Act; to make available, to such persons or classes of person as may be prescribed, such documents and information relating to the meetings and proceedings of the governing body as may be prescribed.

(2) Documents and information required by the regulations to be made available shall be made available in such form and manner, and at such times, as may be prescribed.'—[Mr. Chris Patten.]

Brought up, and read the first time.

5.25 pm

Mr. Chris Patten: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to consider new clause 12.

Mr. Patten: In bringing forward this new clause, the Government are fulfilling an undertaking made at

[Mr. Patten]

Committee stage, especially to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris). We were spectacularly open-minded and generous in Committee, and this is one of several examples of the generosity of spirit that we showed during the happy weeks of June and July. The purpose of the new clause is to enable regulations to be made to provide for public access to the documents of school and college governing bodies.

It may be helpful for me to say a little about the content of the regulations on which, of course, we shall consult widely in draft. I stress that because it is important. We intend to specify that the agendas, papers and minutes of governing bodies should be available for inspection at the school or college concerned, and at all the schools grouped under a single governing body. We intend to provide in the regulations that references to disciplinary matters concerning named individuals, whether pupils or staff, and to discussion of named individuals as potential members of staff should remain confidential. In the consultation process, we shall ask particularly for guidance on the precise form that such a provision should take.

In framing the regulations we shall also bear in mind the point made in Committee by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) that signed minutes would not be available until the meeting after that of which they are a record and we shall consider whether draft minutes should not therefore be made available. I should mention in passing that amendment No. 55 will delete the provision in paragraph (c) of clause 8(6) since this is overtaken by the new clause. I am sure that the House will welcome this further evidence of the Government's support for public access to papers.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): We welcome this small concession from the Government, although it is sad that they did not manage to come up with rather more, which would have made the Bill rather better. If the new governing bodies are to be affected by the Bill, it is important that there is as open an access to as many documents as possible. I hope that on many occasions, the governors will meet in public, so that they can encourage a wide debate on matters such as the curriculum, discipline in schools and resources. We all recognise that there is a problem, in giving access to documents, with certain issues with which governors deal, such as the appointment of staff, or the suspension of staff or pupils.

We still think that there would have been distinct advantages in going through the procedure, originally suggested by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), and set out in the new clause tabled by the Liberal party. Simply adding this provision to the Local Government (Access to Information) Act would have made it more clear and precise to those who want to press for access to all the documents. The Act makes provisions for keeping confidential matters that relate to individuals, and it would be far easier if there were a clear statement of all the information that people have the right to seek. I suspect that it will only add to the confusion if access to information about governing body meetings is set out by regulations.

I appreciate that the Government want to consult carefully about the regulations but enshrining the right to information in primary legislation has major advantages. I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will allow us to vote on new clause 12, which would go the whole hog and put the right into primary legislation rather than having the Government's compromise of doing it by regulation.

Mr. Freud: New clause 12 was originally drafted by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) and moved by him in Committee. He has a good record on open government and access to information matters. Essentially, the clause extends the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985 to meetings of school and college governing bodies. There is a clear prima facie case for making that move.

The Bill is about democratising school governing bodies and involving more people in their affairs, and about extending their boundaries to give citizens a real part in governing their schools. It is not only right but necessary to open up the school meetings, given the new and enhanced responsibilities that the governing bodies will have.

Above all, I believe that the ideas embodied in the Bill, about involving parents and the community and making education more accountable, should not stop with the increase in the number of parents on the governing bodies. It is not good enough simply to legislate for such an increase. We should be concerned with ensuring the fullest possible opportunities for involving all the parents and the community as much of the time as is possible.

The real impact of parental involvement, which can be very profound, on educational standards, will come not from the formal election of a few parents but from the openness and accessibility of the work of the school and the governing body. The hon. Member for Oxford, East gave eloquent testimony to the actual working of open government in governing bodies when he spoke in Committee of schools where this was the normal and accepted practice. He argued, and I share his opinion, that decisions were better made in the open, and that the quality of the decision-making process was enhanced.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary argued that the Government would look into this matter with care when the time came to draft the regulations. However, what has been drafted is inadequate. What is so different about school governing bodies from local government that the former is to be dealt with by regulations rather than by legislation? Do the Government not recognise the immense symbolic importance of having such a clause in the Bill? The access to records and minutes already permitted by the regulations does not compare to a statutory right to attend the meetings.

New clause 18 is clearly inadequate and much less of a reform than would be acceptance of new clause 12. I ask the Government to think again about this. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to let the House have a separate vote on new clause 12 so that genuine access to information can be available to the people by right, and not as a special benefit. As the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said, we already have guarantees of confidentiality. We should like freedom of access to governing bodies meetings enshrined in legislation.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) for his support in Committee and for his kind words today. His support for freedom of information goes back a long way before I became a Member of Parliament.

I am pleased that the Government have moved new clause 18, on the basis that half a loaf is better than none and that we have made considerable progress since the Bill was first drafted. I would have preferred it if my hon. Friend the Minister had been able to take on board rather more whole-heartedly the provisions of section 100J of the Local Government (Access to Information) Act. I appreciate that there are some technical difficulties in moving to that stage straight away. However, I am grateful that we have been able to make substantial progress before the Bill left the House of Commons.

The hon. Member for Cambridge, North-East spoke about what we were being offered, and by implication what we were not being offered. We are being given reasonable provisions for documents and information relating to the meetings and proceedings of governing bodies. That is welcome, particularly as we shall not have to go through the charade of being able to see the minutes of governing body meetings only after they have been approved by the governors. That meant waiting until the next governors' meeting had approved and signed them, by which time they were meaningless. This point was taken well by my hon. Friend the Minister in Committee, and it is good to see that the words "and at such times" in new clause 18(2) are intended to cover that eventuality.

However, we are left with the absence from the new clause of any provision allowing members of the public to attend governors' meetings as a matter of right. There is an irony there. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary wrote to me and to other members of the Committee after the sitting in which my proposed new clause had been debated, and made it clear that the Government were not unsympathetic to the general idea of access to information and the extension of that to education. He went on to make a somewhat curious argument about how governors' meetings were not meetings in the sense of councillors' meetings or meetings of health authority members, but merely meetings of groups of people who were part of the administrative process of the education system—rightly, as a number of my hon. Friends have said. However, my hon. Friend went on to say that governors' meetings had a status that meant that they would be injured or devalued if the public were permitted access.

I stress that when I talk about public access, I accept, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, that when dealing with named individuals, whether members of staff or pupils, many of the conditions that apply now in local authority agenda where part II requirements are frequently invoked, should be made available for meetings of school governors. No one disputes that, least of all me or the other hon. Members on both sides of the House who have supported the campaign.

More importantly, the argument that there is something qualitatively different about a governors' meeting as distinct from the meeting of a health authority, and that the former should be treated differently for public access purposes, is most unconvincing. Members of health authorities are appointed from many different bodies. They serve various sectional interests and their job is far more technical than that of school governors. All hon. Members will agree that members of health authorities deal with a specific allocated budget, and so they are in many ways immune to political arguments. Their job is to dispose only of the health resources allocated to them.

It has always been accepted that the meetings of health authorities should be public, but the issues dealt with by school governors' meetings are just as relevant to the public.

Mr. Freud: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the issues dealt with by health authorities are not as confidential?

Mr. Norris: That is entirely right. However, the proceedings of a health authority and of a school's governing body are both likely to be extremely important to the local community. We are discussing whether we should extend to governors' meetings the old received wisdom that the meetings of a local council or of a local health authority can be attended by the public. Much attention has been paid to the idea of allowing public access to the meetings of water boards. For some reason it is suggested that school governing bodies should be exempt from this process. However, the distinction is neither logical nor, more importantly, justifiable. A more important principle is involved.

Mr. Chris Patten: Just to inform me more clearly on this matter, will my hon. Friend tell me whether the meetings of management units are held in public?

Mr. Norris: If we start talking about angels dancing on pinheads we could, no doubt, think of many groups of public sector servants who do not meet in public. But there is a qualitative difference. The unit management group of a hospital is generally composed of the unit administrator, the treasurer, the medical officer designated to be a member of the unit medical group and possibly the nursing officer. They deal, literally, with nothing but administration. They are neither required to make, nor do they make, policy decisions other than those which have been directly delegated to them by the health authority, which meets in public.

Frankly, I am disappointed with my hon. Friend the Minister. If he was trying to think of an example to upset my logical progression he has picked a bad one. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) argued long and hard about access to information in local government. It is always argued that there are technical difficulties which make it impossible to allow regulations to be invoked. It is always said that there are technical difficulties, and that such a step would upset or offend this or that group, and it would cause difficulties. As those hon. Members who have been kind enough to read the information that I have often sent them will know the universal, non-partisan conclusion is that the problems are simply perceived and are not real. In practice it is perfectly possible for a governing body to operate effectively, knowing that what is said will be open to immediate public access and scrutiny. The only change is that standards of presentation and of argument on the part of governors would have to improve. Governors would no longer be able to get away with an irresponsible, rather unfair or subjective aside which might have passed for judgment in days gone by.

We have half a loaf, and we should be thankful for that. The amendment which I moved in Committee and which now appears as the new clause shows the way forward. I commend that way forward to my hon. Friend the Minister. I appreciate that we shall need consultation, and that we should get things right before we embark on such a course, but access to information is a vital concomitant to a progressive and modern education service.

5.45 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) has just said. I am in favour of extending to parents as much control over schools as possible. If we are to improve education, which is, at the moment, rather an uphill task, it is desirable to make schools and their governing bodies as responsive to the consumer as possible. One way in which schools can be made responsive to the consumer is to meet the principle that underpins new clause 12. For that reason I am sympathetic to what my hon. Friend has said, and I support his broad objectives.

On the principle that half a loaf is better than no loaf, I propose to support new clause 18. It is the kind of clause that will delight officials and should distress parliamentarians, because it is an enabling clause. It does remarkably little. It merely empowers a Minister to embark on the process of secondary legislation. We must ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State what it obliges him to do. The answer is that it does not oblige him to do anything.

Let us consider new clause 18. The Secretary of State "may make regulations". That is nice. He "may make regulations" but equally he may not make them. It is not a mandatory duty.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in Committee we discovered that several of the regulating powers which the Minister had taken in the Education Act 1980 had still not been brought into effect by him?

Mr. Hogg: That is true of every major statute that provides for secondary legislation that I have ever encountered. From the early 1960s, statute after statute empowers Ministers to make regulations, although they frequently do not do so. That is my point. These provisions do not require the Secretary of State to do anything. He can scratch his head and say, "I am able to do so, but I do not choose to do so." No one can say anything about that. If the Minister persuades himself to make regulations what will they say? New clause 18 is remarkably silent on that.

The Secretary of State may make regulations

"requiring the governing body . . . to make available, to such persons or classes of person as may be prescribed."

That is interesting. We do not know what will be prescribed. It is entirely within the Secretary of State's discretion. What will he do? He will make available such "documents and information relating to the meetings and proceedings of the governing body as may be prescribed."

There is no mandatory duty there.

Subsection (2) of the new clause states:

"Documents and information required by the regulations to be made available shall be made available in such form and manner, and at such times, as may be prescribed."

The magic phrase appears for the third time. It is a splendid enabling new clause, but it does not tell my hon. Friend the Minister what he has to do, to whom the information is to be released and in what circumstances it is to be released.

I am an enemy of secondary legislation. For important matters, the House needs to create the statutory duties and to impose the statutory conditions. I am against leaving such things to secondary legislation, both as a matter of principle and as a matter of practice. After all, we all know that my hon. Friend the Minister will come along with regulations that may, or may not be debated. Even if they are debated, the debate will be on a motion to affirm or negative them. As we all know, such motions are taken late at night for one and half hours, and are not amendable. Thus, we shall be given the privileged opportunity of rejecting or accepting the regulations in their totality. That is not a proper way of dealing with matters of major importance.

On the principle that half a loaf is a damned sight better than no loaf at all, I shall support new clause 18. It would be a mistake, however, for my hon. Friend the Minister to suppose that the House is wholly satisfied with it. I am sure that the House would like to see a more robust approach in future.

Mr. Chris Patten: Although the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) thought that I should be prepared to think again, I am afraid that I am not prepared to do so despite his moving and worthy tributes to my hon. and very able Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris). Indeed, new clause 18 is a small tribute to the eloquence, passion and enthusiasm that my hon. Friend has shown in the cause of access to information.

We look forward to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on the draft regulations, and we shall publish the draft regulations as soon as we reasonably can. New clause 12 seeks to apply the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985 to the governing bodies of schools and establishments of further education. That would have two effects. First, it would make the governing body's agenda, papers and minutes more widely available. After discussion in Committee, the Government accepted the logic of that, and new clause 18 makes appropriate provision. However, I realise that my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham would have preferred us to act otherwise.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Although I understand why the words "as may be prescribed" are in the new clause, I do not understand why the first sentence says:

"The Secretary of State may make regulations".

Why does it not say "shall make regulations"?

Mr. Patten: We pursued formulas that had been used before. But I am happy to make it clear that we shall be bringing forward draft regulations, and will look forward to comments on them.

We believe that our approach in new clause 18 is much more straightforward than applying the Local Government (Access to Information) Act, which would need various modifications to fit it to the particular circumstances of governing bodies. The need for such modifications underlines the important point that governing bodies should not be seen simply as part of the local government structure. It has been the intention since the 1944 Act that a governing body should be an independent voice speaking for its school in the local partnership. The Bill aims to make that a reality in all cases.

That brings me to the second effect of seeking to apply the Local Government (Access to Information) Act, which would be to allow public access to meetings. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East referred to what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said in Committee. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary then argued that, unlike local authority councils or committees, properly meeting in public, meetings of a governing body are not formal events in the administrative process but part of that process itself. He went on to argue that the closest analogy might be to a meeting of education department officials. I accept that. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East and I disagree on this point. I believe passionately, although perhaps not as passionately as he does, in there being reasonable access to public discussion and documents, but the logic of my hon. Friend's argument sometimes makes him tip over into the assumption that any decision made in public will be better than a decision that is not made in public.

Mr. Norris: I fear that it is not me who is tipping over on this occasion. My hon. Friend's well known intellect and moderation will have enabled him to observe that there is qualitative difference between the meeting of an education committee's group of officers, whose job involves planning to carry out a policy that has been given to that committee by elected members who meet in public, and the meeting of a groups of governors who have been appointed from among a variety of interest groups so that they have special qualities and views to bring to bear on any debate. In part, the latter make policy and in part they make a significant input into a local school. Thus, their meetings are much more important to the community than any meeting of an education committee's officers. If that is not so, it is an indictment more of the officers' meeting than of the inadequacies of the provisions made by school governors.

Mr. Patten: I do not think that my hon. Friend and I will have a meeting of minds on this point, but perhaps I should try another tack. The Government also consider that unfettered public access to working meetings would be wrong. In my judgment, the effectiveness of governing bodies as a means of securing co-operative effort from governors drawn from a variety of sources would be severely hampered if they were required to meet in public, even with some safeguards for confidential matters.

I invite the House to consider the practical implications of allowing public access to meetings. In some cases, it might be very difficult for parents to share in the responsibilities that we want them to have. I wonder whether parent governors would always be able to perform to their full potential in raising and exploring inevitably awkward questions about standards and discipline in the face of a large, and possibly hostile, audience. That is not to say that governing bodies should be secretive. New clause 18 will ensure that their papers and the records of their proceedings are appropriately open. Governors would also be able to report back to those whom they represent. The governing body as a whole will be fully accountable to the parent body once a year through the annual report and parents' meeting.

Additionally, it is our intention that the post-Act guidance will encourage governing bodies to be as open as possible in their proceedings by inviting observers or allowing public access as they think fit. But we see it as crucial to the effective function of governing bodies that the attendance of non-members should be under their control. The House will note that I have set out my case based on my judgment of some of the principles involved. I know that it is always a dirty trick to make my next point, but there would be technical difficulties

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Drafting errors.

Mr. Patten: — in making this apparently simple amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham is as perceptive as ever. Much work would be needed to ensure that various provisions of the Local Government (Access to Information) Act were appropriate to the special context of governing bodies. In the light of all that, I hope that the House will accept the Government's new clause, even if some hon. Members think that it is only half a loaf. I also invite the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East to withdraw his motion and new clause. But should he wish to press it to a Division, I must urge hon. Members to reject it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): In response to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) and in order to help the House, I should say that if new clause 18 is added to the Bill, new clause 12 will automatically fall.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 19

RECOUPMENT: CROSS-BORDER PROVISIONS

'(1) The Secretary of State may make regulations requiring or authorising payments of amounts determined by or under the regulations to be made by one authority to another where—

(a) the authority receiving the payment makes, in such cases or circumstances as may be specified in the regulations, provision for education in respect of a pupil having such connection with the area of the paying authority as may be so specified; and

(b) one of the authorities is a local education authority and the other an education authority in Scotland.

(2) The basis on which amounts payable under the regulations are to be determined shall be such as the Secretary of State sees fit to specify in the regulations and may, in particular, be similar to that adopted by him in relation to directions given under section 48(1) of this Act.

(3) Any question concerning the connection of any pupil with the area of a particular local education authority or education authority shall be decided in accordance with the provisions of the regulations.

(4) The reference in subsection (1) above to provision for education includes a reference to provision of any benefits or services for which provision is made by or under the enactments relating to education.'.—[Mr. Dunn.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

6 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Dunn): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 16 — A Survey of Recoupment—

'Before implementing the provisions of section 48, the Secretary of State shall set up a survey of the financial and educational consequences of changes to the present system of recoupment.'.

Amendment No. 174, in clause 48, page 54, line 7, after 'amount' insert

'reflecting the average cost of provision to the providing authority'.

Amendment No. 175, in page 54, line 7, after 'agree', insert

'provided that such an amount does not exceed the total cost of tuition.'.

Amendment No. 176, in page 54, line 8, after 'amount', insert

'reflecting the average cost of provision to the providing authority'.

Government amendment No. 177.

Mr. Dunn: The new clause provides for the making of regulations dealing with cross-border recoupment between England and Wales and Scotland and vice versa.

Although, generally speaking, clause 48 both covers and extends the provisions for recoupment which appear in section 31 of the Education Act 1980, it does not contain a provision corresponding to that found in section 31(5). The latter provides a regulation-making power to deal with recoupment between education authorities north and south of the border. The purpose of the new clause is to remedy that omission.

The reason why that step was not taken earlier is that there were technical complications arising from the fact that the 1980 Act provision was subsequently re-enacted, for Scotland, in the Education (Scotland) Act 1980. That has given rise to doubts as to the scope of the powers to make one set of regulations binding on authorities on both sides of the border. Discussion between the respective education departments in London, Cardiff and Edinburgh has led to the conclusion that, in order to clarify the position, there should be included in the present Bill provision empowering the Secretary of State at large to make regulations governing cross-border recoupment between English and Welsh local education authorities and Scottish education authorities. To avoid adding more material to the already lengthy clause 48, the required provision has been set out in a new clause with reference as appropriate to relevant parts of clause 48.

Government amendment No. 177 is a drafting amendment designed to protect the freedom of providing authorities to refuse admission to further education students from other authorities when they know that recoupment will not be forthcoming.

Recoupment in schools is already automatic. That is, the providing local education authorities have an automatic entitlement to recoupment in respect of provision made for pupils of other authorities. The clause extends the principle of automatic recoupment to most, but not all, non-advanced further education. The exact scope of automatic recoupment in FE will be prescribed in regulations to be made under subsection (2). The purpose of subsection (5) is to support the free movement of students across local education authority boundaries by providing that it shall not be a ground for refusing admission to a student that he or she lives in the area of another local education authority.

The Government have decided, however, that it is unreasonable to expect authorities to bear the cost of providing for students not falling within the scope of automatic recoupment whose home authorities refuse consent to pay. It seems likely that a refusal to admit on the grounds that the home local education authority would not pay recoupment would be considered by the courts as tantamount to a refusal on the grounds of residence in the area of another authority. The application of subsection (5) therefore needs to be restricted to students to whom automatic recoupment applies, and the amendment to subsection (6) is designed to enable that to be done.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): The Under-Secretary asks us to accept new clause 19, which provides yet again for the making of more regulations. It is sad that the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) is not in his place to support us. His spirit may be with us on this matter. We would have welcomed his voice supporting us, because many of the things that he said about new clause 18 apply equally to new clause 19.

When moving new clause 18 the Minister of State wrapped himself in a cloak of generous flexibility——

Mr. Chris Patten: Not for long.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister's attitude was not very generous or flexible for as long as it lasted. The Government were defeated time and again in Committee, often on non-controversial matters, so it is surprising that their response to the debates in Committee is a small matter of only two clauses, to put right the many arguments that they lost resoundingly. Those arguments often came from the Government's own Back Benches, as well as from the Opposition Benches. It is hardly generous or flexible that we have the two new clauses, particularly as everyone on both sides of the House has said, because new clause 18 goes only half way to meet the point. New clause 19 seems to have missed the point altogether.

I take the point that the Under-Secretary made about cross-border recoupment for Scotland, but he will appreciate that in Committee other matters were raised that represented important considerations for local government, both financially and legally. It is sad that the Minister has not managed to add to the new clause some way of addressing those problems, which he acknowledged in the debate were serious matters.

The Minister will recall that he said at our 12th sitting that he would "undertake to reconsider the matter without any commitment to taking action on Report." — [Official Report, Standing Committee B; 8 July 1986, c. 560.]

Much to our disappointment, the hon. Gentleman has failed to do so. The new clause would have commanded greater support on both sides of the House had that happened. The points that we were making on the problems of recoupment were directed not only at the deficiencies in relation to Scotland, but at redistribution in general. They were about the savings that the Minister claimed would be made through recoupment. We wondered whether the recoupment clause included adult education. The problem of further education is at the base of the recoupment problem and, sadly, the new clause does not tackle that at all.

In so far as the Government address the problem of recoupment at all, as the hon. Member for Grantham said, the new clause will do very little. It provides for the making of regulations, which, under the terms of the new clause, will be unspecific. Subsection (1) refers to the eligibility of pupils. It refers to "a pupil having such connection with the area of the paying authority as may be so specified".

Perhaps when he responds to the debate the Under-Secretary will say how the regulations will address the problem of connection and eligibility. How will he specify that in his regulations? It would be helpful to hon. Members on both sides of the House if he gave us some idea of how the regulations will be addressed.

The most important subsection is subsection (2), which addresses the problem of the basis for determining the amounts. Whether it relates to Scotland or to the whole of the United Kingdom is at the nub of the debate on recoupment. First, the Government are not certain of the basis, because the clause states:

"as the Secretary of State sees fit to specify in the regulations".

The House will be asked to approve the new clause having had to guess what the basis of redistribution will be. Secondly, the argument is turned in on itself by the Government when they refer us back to the original clause 48(1). Either way, it is extremely unsatisfactory that we do not know, and local authorities will be no wiser after today's debate, and after the Bill becomes an Act, about what form redistribution will take and on what basis they must plan their finances.

The new clause is totally deficient and lacking in the information to which local authorities will have to address themselves, particularly in regard to further education. In Committee the Under-Secretary recognised that further education would be a real problem, both in the uncertainty of the sums concerned and in whether they will be anticipated in a further year. We in the Labour party make our position clear in new clause 16 and amendments Nos. 174 to 176. In our new clause, we ask for a survey so that before the Minister rushes into giving those unspecified and unclear directions to local authorities he understands what the financial implications will be. In Committee the hon. Gentleman was not able to tell us what information he had on the financial implications for local authorities, and he did not address himself to that matter today.

If the House is to be asked to do something strange for local government, which is to ask one local authority to allow its neighbouring authority to commit itself and its ratepayers to financial consequences in a following year, the Minister should have a clear idea of the scale of the problem for local authorities. In Committee we gave the Under-Secretary some suggestions of the financial consequences feared by some local authorities such as Northumberland and Staffordshire—perhaps £1 million a year for Staffordshire and even rising to £3 million a year by the 1990s.

It will be difficult to ask the ratepayers affected by recoupment to shoulder such additional expense. The Under-Secretary would be better advised to accept new clause 16, which would give him time to look at the financial consequences. He could go back to the shire counties and other authorities—which often border on metropolitan areas—and get a clear idea of the financial implications of what he expects to be undertaken by other authorities on their behalf. This is a strange and new concept in local government finance.

I commend to the House amendments Nos. 174 to 176. They would improve the new clause enormously. They are addressed, as I hope the regulations will be—perhaps the Under-Secretary will enlighten the House on whether that is so—to the technical method of assessing the cost of one local authority as against another. Amendments Nos. 174 and 176 suggest that the method should be based on the average cost of provision. In amendment No. 175 we state that the cost should not exceed the cost of tuition. Local authorities need to know the basis on which these regulations will be formed, so that they may anticipate the future costs that will fall to them.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will recognise that these are serious considerations and that he will be able to tell the House considerably more about the regulations, for which he is asking the House to give him an open cheque. Unfortunately, the open cheque will have to be cashed by many of the local authorities.

Mr. Dunn: I had hoped that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) would have been converted to our point of view, which we expressed so eloquently in Committee, regarding the question of recoupment.

We made it plain that the whole thrust of the legislation which we were presenting was to make available, to many more people, a variety of provisions which may exist outside the local education authority area in which they live. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central has not been converted to the idea of the free market of choice—in which I believe—in the few weeks since we last met in Committee.

We have adopted a flexible approach. In earlier exchanges between Opposition Members and my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)—whose opinion I always respect on so many matters

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Hear, hear.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Do not overdo it.

6.15 pm

Mr. Dunn: I do not wish to be accused of overdoing anything. If anything, I am accused of being rather laid back on too many occasions for the good of debates in the House.

The House will recall that clause 48 is not just about the introduction of automatic recoupment in non-advanced further education. One of its main purposes is to update the existing legislation relating to recoupment in primary and secondary schools, as well as further education, the better to reflect the realities of current administrative practice in this complex area, and it goes a long way in clarifying the Secretary of State's powers to determine disputes. The Government would not wish the implementation of these general provisions to be delayed while the proposed survey was put in hand and the new clause, as drafted, is unacceptable for that reason.

Beyond that, we do not believe that such a survey is necessary, or practicable. The Government have always acknowledged that the introduction of automatic recoupment—sometimes called "free trade"—in NAFE would cause some short-term redistribution of costs between LEAs as the real pattern of demand asserts itself. While it would be sensible for local authorities to try to assess the local effects of the introduction of free trade, it would not be practicable to attempt to measure the extent of these short-term gains and losses on a national basis. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, to his credit, referred in Committee to some work done by Staffordshire LEA based on the number of out-county permits refused each year, but even were we to go to the expense of collecting this kind of information from all, or at least a representative sample of authorities—many authorities' records would be far from adequate for this purpose—this would tell us nothing about the number of students who seek advice informally and are persuaded not to apply, or who assume it is not worth applying for out-of-county places. Neither would such an imperfect "snapshot" indicate how patterns of demand are likely to alter as a result of demographic change, reorganisation of 16 to 19-year-old provision we debated this in Committee and the development of YTS and other new kinds of provision. It would, in short, be a time-consuming and expensive exercise which would produce little if anything in the way of meaningful results.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Minister confirm that his scepticism of the survey means that he believes the figures that would be produced would be greatly in excess of the figures that Staffordshire and other authorities have already produced the figure of between £1 million and £3 million a year? If that is so, the financial problems we anticipate for the local authorities will be horrendous.

Mr. Dunn: I am sure the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central will accept that I have acknowledged that there will be short-term gains and losses depending on the popularity and the availability of certain courses, especially where a number of local authorities meet.

In the long term I do not believe that these manifestations will be a problem. There will be a settling, rather like the settling of sediment at the bottom of a wine decanter. Local authorities can meet informally to discuss how best to rationalise provision. In Committee we spent a great deal of time discussing problems faced by my own constituency of Dartford, but I will not repeat them as it would be too long and tedious for Opposition Members. Committee members were persuaded of the upset and concern of many of my constituents—it may also affect the constituents of Opposition Members—when people find that they have been denied access to institutions of their choice simply because it is in a local authority other than that in which they live. The institution may have been in the local authority in which they work—indeed, the provisions and cases vary.

The House must accept that, under the present voluntary arrangements, LEAs which are so inclined can protect their own colleges at the expense of the freedom of the individual to choose. That is the key to the Government's attitude on the matter.

Protectionism allows the providers to avoid the need to satisfy the real needs of their customers, and probably means that the overall system costs more as a result of this distortion of the market. Of course the adjustment will be painful in some cases: LEAs which suffer a net loss of students to their neighbours will have to bear increased recoupment costs and it will take some time for them to rationalise their provision to the real level of demand and realise offsetting savings. Conversely, those LEAs whose colleges attract more students will be able to make efficiency gains as well as receive more recoupment income.

The Government believe not only that, over time, these movements will balance out but that, in the long term, the creation of a free market in NAFE will prompt the system to become more flexible and more responsive to the needs of its clients, providing better value for money throughout the service. The Government do not believe that this important reform should be delayed pending the outcome of a survey, a study which can only be based on speculation and guesswork, leading to conclusions of dubious validity.

Amendments Nos. 174 and 176 would change the basis on which costs are recouped so that the amounts concerned, instead of reflecting the national average cost of provision, would reflect the average cost of provision within each providing authority, which could be significantly higher than the national average.

As for the level of such charges, the Government would like the existing system to continue—local authorities to decide for themselves, in the Inter-Authority Payments Committee, the basis of the standard rates which are used for the calculation of the great majority of the sums which local education authorities can recover under the recoupment arrangements. There are, of course, several rates which apply to different types of provision primary, secondary under school leaving age, secondary over school leaving age, for example—and variants of them apply depending on whether the providing authority has to pay London weighting allowance. In all cases, however, the rates and the variants of them are based on the average cost of such provision, within the totality of the authorities to which the variant applies.

The proposed amendments would deprive such a system of any support in law. Under section 31 of the Education Act 1980, local education authorities are enabled to recoup such amounts as they may agree between themselves. Clause 48 of the present Bill re-enacts this, but under the proposed amendments, instead of local education authorities being entitled collectively to agree to recoup on the basis of standard rates based on the national average cost of provision, providing authorities would be entitled to make claims which reflected only the average cost of provision within the authority concerned.

If local education authorities are, as now, willing to agree collectively to use the national average cost of provision as the basis for recoupment, and if the law now enables then to do so, the Government do not think that it would be sensible, in administrative terms to take the legal basis for that away, and will therefore resist the amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 44

ABOLITION OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Pawsey: I beg to move amendment No. 153, in page 47, line 20, leave out clause 44.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Amendment No. 154, in page 47, line 31, leave out subsection (3).

Amendment No. 155, in page 47, line 32, leave out

'anything done for reasons that include averting'

and insert

'the use of such force as is reasonable in the circumstances to avert'.

Amendment No. 156, in page 47, line 36, leave out subsection (4).

Amendment No. 157, in page 48, line 6, leave out from 'school' to end of line 10.

Amendment No. 158, in page, 48, line 10, at end insert—

'(iv) at a day nursery or other provision for children aged under five maintained or assisted by a local authority'.

Amendment No. 159, in page 48, line 13, leave out 'by a local education' and insert

'or assisted by a local'

Amendment No. 160, in page 48, line 15, leave out paragraph (c).

Amendment No. 161, in page 48, line 19, leave out subsection (6).

Amendment No. 161, in page 49, line 10, leave out second 'education'.

Amendment No. 163, in page 49, line 12, leave out 'employed by the authority'.

Amendment No. 164, in page 49, line 13, leave out 'employed by the authority'.

Amendment No. 164, in page 49, line 24, leave out Clause 45.

New clause 20.—Corporal punishment

'Decisions on the principle of the administration of reasonable corporal punishment in a school shall be taken by the head teacher in consultation with the governing body and any organisation of parents of children attending the school.'

Amendment (a) to the proposed new clause, in line 3, at end add

'provided that no such decision is in contradiction of the ruling of the European Court'.

Mr. Pawsey: It might help the House if I outline the events which led to amendment No. 153, in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), being tabled. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, who has done much work on this issue for a considerable time.

In 1982, a judgment by the European Court of Human Rights on corporal punishment in schools said that the philosophical conviction of any parents should be respected. There is, however, no blanket objection to the use of corporal punishment, provided that it is moderate and reasonable. Some local education authorities have banned it using the articles of government of schools. Others have used teachers' contracts of employment. The latter method has yet to be decided on by the courts. I therefore assure the House that, if it votes in favour of the amendment, it would allow governing bodies to decide whether to use corporal punishment. The local education authority would not be able to impose its will on governing bodies using the articles of government.

In an endeavour to clarify the matter, the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill was introduced last year. The House will remember that it was wrecked in another place. The present Education Bill started life in another place and would prohibit the use of corporal punishment. The amendment produced in another place was drafted defectively, so the Government had to redress that problem. Clauses 44 and 45 are the result.

It will be helpful to recall that the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill received a Second Reading in the other place but was wrecked on Report. I am not suggesting that that is unique, but it must be rare.

Amendments Nos. 153 and 165 would delete clauses 44 and 45 and restore the status quo in that it would be possible to use corporal punishment in schools. One of the more worrying aspects of this affair is the way in which the other place has disregarded the will of this elected Chamber. The Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill received a Third Reading in this House without Division. Despite that evident unanimity, the other place overturned the Bill. I am not suggesting that that is unconstitutional and I do not deny the right of unelected Peers to impose their will on what they may describe as the lower Chamber, but this House is truly representative of the British people. It is hon. Members of this House who seek election. The House might therefore agree that wrecking amendments to two Bills to destroy their purpose in a matter which affects almost every family in the land are to be deeply regretted.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not want to be unfair to the other place. He will recall that, in the Committee on the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill in 1985, on which I served, hon. Members on both sides expressed grave concern about enabling parents to opt out of corporal punishment. There was a strong feeling in the Committee that, if we complied with the convention and the Court, we would have to proceed to complete abolition. It would be wrong to suggest that there was not a substantial body of support for that policy in this place.

Mr. Pawsey: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that genuinely helpful intervention, as he gives me an opportunity to repeat that there was no Division on Third Reading of that Bill.

Thoughtful hon. Members, jealous of this House's powers and traditions, may view the other place's actions with some concern or even trepidation.

One of the Bill's principal aims is the devolution of power and the allocation of responsibility. Amendment No. 153 would allow that process to continue in the important area of school discipline. If approved, it would allow local options which reflect the ethos of local society. It would be for the governing body, in the light of discussions with parents and others, to decide whether corporal punishment should be retained.

The Bill provides for an increase in parental representation on governing bodies. It would therefore seem logical that parents should have a considerable say in the discipline of their children. Parents want their children to have an education which is relevant to work. They want their children to obtain worthwhile qualifications. They do not want a casual, sloppy or do-as-you-please attitude in schools. They want discipline in schools. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful to my hon. Friends for that expression of support. I am anxious that schools should decide what is best for them. I do not believe that a blanket decision taken in a council chamber which is miles away in distance and attitude from the school is necessarily right.

The amendment would leave room for the European Court. Its decision would stand, and no child would be caned against the wishes of the parent. Here is a British solution to a European-induced dilemma. Those who dislike what they regard as European interference in the United Kingdom's domestic affairs have here an opportunity to redress matters.

Mr. Marlow: If this House of elected representatives of the British people decided that corporal punishment should be retained, is it not overwhelmingly apparent that the European Court of Human Rights or whatever else it cares to call itself would have no status whatever in the issue, in moral terms at the very least?

6.30 pm

Mr. Pawsey: I hear what my hon. Friend says and I am well aware of his views on Europe, whether on court matters or otherwise. If he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will no doubt pursue the case that he wishes to argue.

A teacher acting in loco parentis has the right to act as a moderate and reasonable parent would act. If that moderate and reasonable parent sees fit to use corporal punishment to restrain the child, why should not the caring teacher have a similar right when standing in place of the parent?

Corporal punishment is a matter of considerable importance. Britain has a tradition of corporal punishment in schools. Other nations have their own customs and remedies for school misdemeanours. In France, a child is punished by suspension from school and during that period the social security benefits due in respect of the child are also suspended, so the family can lose a tangible measure of state financial support. The House may feel that when such a remedy is imposed there is no need to cane the child.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Having lived in France for 17 years, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take it from me that children subject to discipline in French schools do not have social security payments withdrawn. The procedure that the hon. Gentleman describes relates to truancy, and the French embassy confirms that even in those cases it is extremely rarely used. The hon. Gentleman should get his facts right.

Mr. Pawsey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I note that he does not deny that in France a child may be punished in that way for a misdemeanour. Truancy is a misdemeanour like any other and the hon. Gentleman admits that the child in question may be punished by suspension and withdrawal of social security payments.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): That is a travesty. It is not the child that is being punished but the parents.

Mr. Pawsey: With the utmost respect to my hon. Friend, that makes matters even worse, because the parents suffer for the errors of the child.

In the Soviet Union, a different method is used. The child's misdemeanours are exhibited on the information board in the factory where the father works. That solution, or the remedy adopted by the French, may commend itself to the House, but I very much doubt it.

In the United States, the decision on corporal punishment is made at local level. In Australia and Canada, it is made on a state-by-state basis. In New Zealand and India, corporal punishment is permitted, so it is quite wrong to suppose that the United Kingdom is unique in retaining corporal punishment.

Members who are minded to vote against the amendment should be honest enough to say what they would put in place of corporal punishment to fill the vacuum left by its abolition. In the wake of the European judgment, about 25 per cent. of English authorities have a policy of aboliton and in schools where corporal punishment is available it is infrequently used.

The principal argument for the cane is not its frequent use but its deterrent effect. Only last week, a respected head teacher of a middle school in my constituency told me that he had a cane but that he could not remember when it was last used. He argued that when a child was sent to his room to be punished for a misdemeanour it would be at the back of the child's mind that the cane might be used. A cane in a corner is a powerful deterrent. It does not have to be used for it to be effective. The era of thrashing, beating and whacking is over. The emotive talk of cruelty to children perpetrated by adults is an exaggeration. The cane is a simple aid to discipline in the same way as the blackboard is an aid to learning.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. Gentleman talks of the cane as a powerful deterrent, but has he seen the photograph in The London Standard showing the marks on a boy punished with a cane? That is a disgraceful state of affairs. Is that the kind of society that the hon. Gentleman wants to encourage? He should look at that photograph and tell the House whether he condones what happened to that boy.

Mr. Pawsey: No one could condone that kind of activity, but hard cases make bad law. It is impossible to legislate for perfection. There will always be exceptions, but there are measures of redress that parents can properly take in the type of situation described by the hon. Gentleman. A teacher in loco parentis should be acting as a reasonable and moderate parent should act. Clear breaches of that principle are obviously wrong and no one could justify them, but that does not damage the basic principle of my argument today.

The amendment would enable the head teacher, together with the governing body, to reach what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State described on 10 June as "a suitable arrangement which would recognise the finding of the European Court of Human Rights that the philosophical convictions of any parent should be respected." — [Official Report, 10 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 186.]

As ever, my right hon. Friend summed up the situation in a nutshell.

Mr. Douglas Hogg rose —

Mr. Pawsey: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will not give way.

If corporal punishment is not available, what will its opponents put in its place? Do they want more suspensions and expulsions? Which does the greater damage to the pupil, exclusion from school or two strokes of the cane on the hand? If detention is thought to be the answer, what is to happen in areas where children depend on the school bus as the only means of transport?

Children require a disciplined environment for learning. Without discipline, there is bullying, time-wasting, vandalism and indifference. Fair and reasonable discipline provides an essential framework for learning.

Conservative Members have a free vote on this. We shall vote according to conscience and belief, but can the same be said for the Opposition?

Mr. Radice: Yes.

Mr. Pawsey: I understand that there is a three-line Whip for the Opposition. How do Labour Members reconcile that with their new slogan of freedom and fairness? Where is their freedom to vote as their conscience dictates? Where is the fairness? Indeed, where are Labour Members today when the House is discussing a matter of key importance to families throughout the country? We recognise that there is room for honest and genuine disagreement on this. It would be unfortunate for the reputation of this House if Opposition Members were prevented from voting in accordance with their own consciences.

The strength of the amendment is that it will maintain the status quo. It will permit the use of the cane, and I believe that a cane in the corner of a head's study is a positive force for good in schools and that its presence helps teachers in the classroom.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Come off it.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman says, "Come off it," but he was a practising teacher, and he will understand the strength of the point that I have just made.

This Education Bill seeks to improve the quality and standard of education in our state schools, and that is where the majority of our children are educated. My amendment will merely assist and continue that process.

Mr. Radice: I speak against the amendments, which would, if accepted, retain corporal punishment, and in favour of clauses 44 and 45, which abolish corporal punishment in England, Wales and Scotland.

We in the Labour party believe that corporal punishment is barbaric, inhumane, degrading both to the chastiser and chastised, and, by its nature, open to abuse. Anyone who has doubts about whether it is open to abuse should glance at page 5 of The London Standard of tonight, which contains an article about an independent Anglican grammar school. There is also a photograph showing the bruises on a 13-year-old pupil who was given five strokes of the cane by the head of his school for getting low marks in an internal exam.

In my view, that picture says far more than all the statistics, but the statistics are bad enough. There are 200,000 officially recorded instances of corporal punishment each year. Some schools have recorded hundreds of instances each year, and in a few schools the same children receive corporal punishment again and again. Unfortunately, cases of abuse are far too frequent, and they include girls and pupils who are physically and mentally handicapped. The fact is that the use of force —which outside the classroom is defined as battery— is inherently dangerous and open to abuse. It is no wonder that corporal punishment has been abolished in every other European country and that the movement in most advanced countries, except South Africa, is towards abolition.

The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) said that in the United States and Australia this was a local decision. He forgets that both Australia and the United States are federal countries where education is a state responsibility. Most of the states in America have abolished corporal punishment as have the two largest states in Australia. The hon. Gentleman might have said that before he used his facts.

It is also no wonder that 90 per cent. of Scottish schools do not use corporal punishment and that more than a quarter of English local education authorities have abolished it. I am pleased to say that this morning Wiltshire county council voted to abolish corporal punishment. The vote was 39 to 24. Two Conservatives voted with Labour and Liberal councillors. I hope that rather more Conservatives will vote against corporal punishment tonight.

There is only one respectable argument in favour of corporal punishment —we heard a bit of it, but not much, from the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth— which is that without such a sanction it would be more difficult to maintain order in the school. There is no hard evidence to support that contention, and it certainly does not justify the dangers of abuse that I described earlier. There is no evidence that discipline in European or Scottish schools is inferior to the discipline in English and Welsh schools. Can any hon. Member produce such evidence?

There is no evidence that discipline in English and Welsh schools where corporal punishment has been abolished is inferior to schools where corporal punishment is still retained. Indeed, such evidence as we have suggests that the use of corporal punishment may be counter-productive. The former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph), was fond of quoting the well-known study of London secondary schools entitled "15,000 Hours". That study found that there was a tendency for high levels of corporal punishment to be associated with unruly behaviour. There is similar evidence from Scotland and Wales as well. It is surely significant that no country and no local education authority has reintroduced corporal punishment once having got rid of it.

I understand that the Secretary of State will not speak on the issue tonight. But on Second Reading he made great play of the fact that heads and governing bodies wished to retain corporal punishment. He might also have pointed out that all the teaching bodies are now in favour of abolition.

Mr. Chris Patten: In a genuine spirit of inquiry, is that now the official position of the Professional Association of Teachers or the NAS/UWT?

Mr. Radice: Yes, the PAT has changed its position, and following the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights, the NAS/UWT has now come out in favour of abolition.

Most professional teachers believe that good discipline and order is far better maintained by firm, constructive and purposeful teaching. We all accept that problems and difficulties arise in classes, but a variety of options exist to deal with such disciplinary matters, including reprimands, reports, parental involvement, withdrawal, suspension and exclusion. All are used by local authorities where corporal punishment has been abolished.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman has just referred to exclusions. Is he telling the House that if corporal punishment is abolished we shall see an increase in the number of exclusions?

Mr. Radice: Not necessarily. I have already quoted the evidence from local authorities where corporal punishment has been abolished, and as I pointed out, behaviour is likely to be better.

The truth is —as the experience of other countries and the schools in England, Scotland and Wales show— that corporal punishment is not necessary to maintain discipline or to deal with disciplinary problems.

Some hon. Members may not so far be persuaded by my arguments. Those who remain in favour of corporal punishment must face up to the consequences of the binding decision of the European Court of Human Rights. The Prime Minister has said on many occasions that she believes that Britain ought to obey the European Court. The decision in February 1982 in the Campbell and Cosans case upheld under article 2 the rights of parents who oppose corporal punishment.

As hon. Members will be aware, the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East, introduced in January 1985 his Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, which attempted to produce a scheme that provided a right of exemption for parents who did not wish their children to suffer corporal punishment.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: No. I have given way twice, and many hon. Members wish to speak.

The opt-out scheme, which we voted against on a reasoned amendment on Second Reading, was almost universally condemned as being unworkable. Indeed, the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) condemned it because it would create two classes of discipline in schools. In the end it was destroyed in the House of Lords. When this Bill was introduced in the House of Lords a clause was added which had the effect of abolishing corporal punishment. Its form may not have been perfect and we amended it in Committee to improve it, but the House of Lords decision was wise because it represented the only practical way of complying with the European Court of Human Rights ruling. Theoretically it may be possible to create two classes of schools, but, as the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East pointed out, that would have enormous practical difficulties, especially in rural areas, and would be hugely expensive.

I have to say that the option espoused by the Secretary of State is not a runner. On Second Reading he explained that he wanted to leave the matter to the new governing bodies and to the heads of schools, and that he wanted schools which continue with corporal punishment to agree suitable arrangements for recognising the conviction of parents who are against corporal punishment. That amounts to a much weakened version of the opt-out scheme of the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East.

If arrangements for opting out are introduced in schools, there will be the problem of two classes of discipline which was universally condemned as unworkable earlier. If arrangements are not introduced, it will be a flagrant breach of the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights. The Secretary of State has already accepted that because he has said that he will monitor the scheme, and that if it does not work, he will return to the old legal opt-out scheme of the former Secretary of State. Even in its present form there is a strong possibility that the Secretary of State's scheme fails to comply with our obligations under the European Convention in that it does not provide a legal right for parents. Certainly there would be a continuing risk of litigation. Hon. Members should remember that more than 30 cases from the United Kingdom are now pending at Strasbourg.

When the Secretary of State made his first speech to the House on Second Reading of the Education Bill, he put forward what he clearly thought was a clever cop-out, but in reality he refused to accept the logic of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights. In doing so he failed to face up to his responsibility both to the House and to the schools of England, Scotland and Wales. This evening we have the opportunity to put the matter right. I urge hon. Members to vote in favour of abolition.

We in the Labour party believe that corporal punishment is barbaric, inhumane and open to abuse, so we shall vote against it. Even if Conservative Members remain in favour of its retention, I urge them to consider the following crucial point: the only practical way to comply with the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights, to retain a workable, efficient system of discipline, and to avoid the problem of two classes of discipline is to vote for the abolition of corporal punishment and against the retentionist amendments which will produce only muddle, confusion and chaos. The only way to produce a lasting and effective solution is to vote against corporal punishment.

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): The importance of discipline and order in our schools as a condition for successful teaching and learning is understood by everyone. The fact that there are widely differing views, certainly in the Conservative party, about the principle and practice of corporal punishment is not surprising. It is essential that we resolve this dispute tonight.

I am opposed to corporal punishment in schools, for two main reasons. First, it is wrong in principle for children to be exposed to physical sanctions and pain which would bring criminal proceedings if they were exercised on an adult. We have outlawed corporal punishment in every area, including in the armed services, yet we reserve it for young people. It is absent from adult life, and it is wholly wrong to impose it on the young. Its practice is undoubtedly humiliating to the teacher who imposes it and to the pupil who receives it. The art of teaching lies in gaining the attention and winning the respect of pupils, and the power to inflict pain is fundamentally incompatible with that objective. In the debate we have heard a call for the cane in the corner. It is a symbol of fear and does not in any way produce the sort of environment for education, teaching, or learning.

My second objection is that corporal punishment is not generally effective. It may be a deterrent to some children, but to others it certainly is not. Children from broken or disturbed homes where physical punishment is the rule rather than the exception are taught that problems can be solved by force. All too often that lesson has tragic consequences later in life. Some teenagers relish a record of punishment as a status symbol, and the same name often crops up again and again in punishment books, often for the same offence. That proves conclusively that corporal punishment is not a deterrent.

It is by no means clear where the borderline between reasonable and moderate lies. Beating a child with a stick cannot possibly be considered to be moderate or reasonable. It is violent. All too often teachers step across that borderline, with disastrous results. Indeed, that is clearly illustrated in a picture in this evening's London Standard. Innumerable similar cases can be reported. They are not isolated instances. A youngster of eight had his finger twisted for the rest of his life because of caning. A youngster of 11 had his finger broken because of caning. A youngster of nine had bleeding hands because he was caned merely for bad work and nothing worse. I would not vote in favour of corporal punishment if I thought that one of those instances would happen, let alone the whole list that can be produced.

The problem now is to reach a coherent solution. In Scotland corporal punishment has been officially discouraged since 1968 and pupils on reaching their majority at 16 become exempt, unless they choose otherwise. In England and Wales local education authorities and school governing bodies have been able to determine their schools' policies. It is no accident that in recent years there has been a strong drift towards abolition in line with the rest of Europe. The tendency has increased since the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the philosophical convictions of parents had to be respected.

I do not believe that giving local education authorities and school governing bodies the option to retain or relinquish corporal punishment is a coherent policy. It is a recipe for local particularism. It will lead to neighbouring schools and authorities having entirely different disciplinary sanctions.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: I accept that there may be a philosophical reason why parents object to their child being subject to corporal punishment, but will my hon. Friend accept that there are some parents—I am one of them—who would rather their child received a short sharp shock, delivered with a controlled and caring approach, than be expelled from school, with all the disadvantages that flow from that, such as disturbance to family life and all the temptations that come to children when they are no longer in school? Will he accept that as a philosophical conviction?

Mr. Bright: My hon. Friend suggests that it is either thrashing or expulsion. That is nonsense.

Mr. Bowden: Expulsion was offered as a sanction.

Mr. Bright: I am not talking about expulsion. It is a last resort, and I accept that it still occurs, but if my hon. Friend examines the experience of some of the areas where corporal punishment has been banned, such as Birmingham, he will find that the number of expulsions has decreased. That does not bear out what he suggests. There are other areas where corporal punishment has been banned that show the same trend.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I respect the views of my hon. Friend, which are well known to me as a fellow Luton Member. He said that the same rules should apply in all schools. Does he accept that in his constituency there are certain schools with rather more problems than one finds in others? Will he accept also that schools in problem areas might have to have end-of-the-road punishments available to teachers? The situations that those teachers face are very different from those in other schools. We are talking about a deterrent. I hope that my hon. Friend will not dwell too much on facts that support his case and ignore the deterrent that is posed by the cane.

Mr. Bright: I accept that there are differences in behaviour in different schools. There are also differences in the approach of different head teachers and teachers. If we allow individual schools to make up their own minds, some schools will have corporal punishment and some will not. Worse still—this is what makes a dog's breakfast of the proposal — there will be schools with corporal punishment, and it will be the right of parents to withdraw their children from that punishment. That will produce two classes of pupil in one school. That would be madness. That would do nothing to help the maintenance of discipline in school. The entire system would be wrecked.

Those who support the proposal before us will be voting for chaos, and nothing less than that. I am against corporal punishment, and I believe that we cannot support something that is nothing more than a dog's breakfast. If a school decides that it will no longer apply corporal punishment, there will be no turning back. It is not something that can suddenly be returned. It is a fact that corporal punishment will gradually phase itself out in any event, and I want to ensure that it is brought to an end tonight.

It is possible to devise a disciplinary system that is based on rewards for good behaviour. At the same time, there can be a range of penalties, such as class reports, loss of privileges, lines, detention and interviews with parents. Such a system undoubtedly requires more commitment from pupils, teachers and parents. The teachers have taken that on board which is why the teachers' unions and the head teachers support this approach. Our neighbours in Europe have shown that such a system can work. This is our opportunity to come into the 20th century, to abandon the cane and to adopt what I believe is a much more positive approach to education.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The hon. Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) made a fine speech. I have never heard such a bad speech from the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey). The hon. Gentleman tried to observe the letter of the EEC regulations, while dodging their spirit. He was trying to have it both ways and, of course, he failed.

The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth offered the House a completely bogus argument in saying that Britain has always had corporal punishment and that it is a tradition. Imagine the House debating slavery and advocates of that practice saying, "We have always had slavery in this country and it is a tradition." Imagine our predecessors in this place saying, "We have always denied women the vote, so why should we now allow women to vote? It is a tradition that they have not had the vote." [Interruption.] I know that even now some hon. Members do not like the concept of women having the vote. Some Members prefer slavery and others prefer corporal punishment. Let it be understood that the tradition argument is bogus and nonsensical.

The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth was offering us a message of despair, in stark contrast to the message offered by Mr. Martin Rosenbaum of the Society of Teachers Opposed to Physical Punishment. He has presented a marvellous message of enlightenment, in which he sets out how Britain can rid itself of corporal punishment to the advantage of teachers and pupils. I pay tribute to Mr. Rosenbaum for the fine work that he has done on behalf of STOPP. Those who oppose STOPP surely do not know anything about the research that it has conducted.

The argument for the retention of corporal punishment is too simple, given the complexity of the problem of maintaining discipline in schools. The advocates of this approach adopt a hanging and flogging mentality, and I suggest that that has no place in the House of Commons now.

[Mr. Jack Ashley]

When we see a child being awkward and difficult, we are often tempted to give it a clip around the ear. Sometimes we want to take that course. We tended to think in the old days that a clip around the ear by a teacher or a policeman solved the problem. It did not. We are seeing the past through rose-tinted spectacles. Clips around the ear imposed injuries and the practice was wrong. It made children resentful and that resentment lasted for life. It is wrong that lifelong resentment should be created when it is thought that a child has done wrong and when the child may think that he has done right. The child may sometimes realise that he has done wrong, but we cannot meet a wrongdoing by hitting somebody, by punching him or by using weapons. I cannot accept that civilised Members of this place are so brutal, stupid, uncivilised and old-fashioned as to believe that hitting someone can solve a problem. That is not the way to deal with the profound problems of control.

I shall make a short speech because I know that many other Members wish to participate in the debate. I believe that it is wrong to try to gain compliance by using force and brutality on children. That is wrong in principle and fallacious in practice. I believe that violence brutalises and begets violence. Some schoolchildren hit back at their teachers, but, even if not then, violence may beget violence later on. Violence is counter-productive. Violence demeans the pupil as well as the teacher. Violence creates rather than solves problems. I therefore hope that the House will use this rare opportunity of taking a real step forward towards a more civilised society. We are not asking for softness or sentimentality. We are asking for a reasonable method of dealing with children in schools. Let us get rid of one element of violence in our violent society, and thereby help teachers and pupils too.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I do not doubt for a moment the sincerity of the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), but I cannot agree with what he says. My remarks are based upon 23 years in the classroom, no fewer than 12 of which were spent in a comprehensive for 1,100 boys in King's Cross, where I was deputy head. With respect, I believe that it is possible to get away from the real world when considering this important issue.

I would never condone bad practice. If properly reported, the example given in The London Standard today is an example of extremely bad practice. To cane a child for bad work is a serious misuse of the cane. If pupils fail to do their best, that is their failure and there is a way to handle it. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) spoke of children's fingers being broken and of blood being drawn. No one who has had the experience of having to administer reasonable corporal punishment, as I have, would condone such treatment for a moment. It is disgraceful and unacceptable, and it is no part of my case when I say that corporal punishment should be retained. I am referring to reasonable corporal punishment administered by the head or deputy head of the school — by someone with experience in the profession, experience in handling children and experience in administering corporal punishment.

The use of emotive words such as "beating", "hitting" and "violence" is not helpful. Corporal punishment should not be seen in those terms. It should be used only for the most serious of school offences, such as the very severe bullying by a large boy of a small boy, or, in some circumstances, perhaps, a boy attacking a teacher.

It is all very well for hon. Members to pontificate in the House of Commons. We need to put ourselves in King's Cross, Deptford, or many other places, in front of a class of 30 or 40 14-year-olds or in a playground where 1,000 or 1,100 boys, or boys and girls, are doing all the things that they do during recreation. One person may have to control that situation. It would be wrong to take away any sanctions in the teacher's hands. At the same time, any sanction must be used carefully and properly.

There are schools not far from this House where there is little or no discipline. Children of all ages, primary and secondary, trot about like packs of hounds, doing what they like, totally out of control, cheeking teachers. I could give examples. The situation is very serious. The severe soccer and social violence from which we suffer does not diminish as sanctions in schools diminish. It seems to get worse.

What does the Bible say? In Proverbs we read:

"He who spares the rod hates his son, but he who loves him is diligent to discipline him."

Perhaps Proverbs goes a little far.

As a schoolboy I received corporal punishment. I have been on both sides of the fence. A teacher should always be positive if he is to be effective. If he is, and if interest can be inspired in the pupils, there will be few disciplinary problems. However, there may always be some. Things can go wrong even in the best of situations, and terrible things can happen outside the classroom.

We must consider every aspect of school life. In my own time as a teacher, I remember quite small boys hitting old women to the floor of their homes and demanding money. Other boys violated animals or beat people up. At the same time, pupils were going to Oxford and Cambridge. In a comprehensive school, there will be those who do very well and there will be those who get into difficulties with the police. We must face that.

Mr. Bell: We listen with great interest to the hon. Gentleman as he draws on his vast experience, but is he not confusing concepts when he relates corporal punishment to acts of violence that are criminal offences?

Mr. Greenway: I am simply giving the background against which a school has to draw its disciplinary lines, and giving one or two examples of what happens every day.

Good teachers have few problems, but we are not dealing only with able teachers. We are dealing with those who find it difficult to teach. Discipline emerges best from good relationships between staff and pupils and among pupils themselves. If relationships are good, there is never any violence. The friendship that people feel for each other enables them to think positively first, and to think of hostile actions only as a very last resort. The encouragement of pupils is absolutely essential and is basic to the well-being of any school. However, there will be bad behaviour in any school. One has only to read "Lord of the Flies" to be reminded of the fallen nature of man. There will be bad behaviour even in the best schools. We must consider what sanctions will be effective.

The school must involve the parents. it must work unremittingly with the parents of the pupil concerned to try to remedy the behavioural difficulties of the child.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): I wonder whether my hon. Friend's constituency postbag reflects mine? I find that, by eight to one, parents and pupils are in favour of what two of my constituents described as "capital punishment" in schools. If that is the general view of most parents, is it not arrogant for the Labour party to deny its own members the opportunity to reflect the views of their constituents?

Mr. Greenway: Many people are confused between the terms, capital and corporal punishment. I deplore the Labour party's stand on this. It is mandated by its party conference and to have a Whip on such an issue is disgraceful.

Many a problem in schools is cured by involving the parents. But, if it is not, how else can it be done? Much can be cured by a teacher's disapproval of a child's behaviour. A look of disapproval, a withering glance or an angry word might cure it, but not always. Lines are disgraceful and are bad education. Setting pupils to do mathematics destroys any love of an important discipline. I deplore suspension and expulsion. For that to roll so easily off the tongue of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South and others is for them to miss a crucial point.

Mr. Bright rose

Mr. Greenway: I am sorry, I think that I have misrepresented my hon. Friend and I apologise. However, that has certainly come from the tongue of others in this debate.

To suspend or expel a pupil is to put outside the school the very children who must be there. They must be there for their education, however difficult they are. I deplore suspensions and expulsions and I am glad to say that I have never been involved in one. If I had been, I would have regarded myself as a gross failure.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: As the hon. Gentleman is taking us through all the possible punishments, will he tell us what, in his experience, people do when a pupil refuses to accept corporal punishment?

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman anticipates my point. In the end something must happen. In many cases children are put into court. If corporal punishment is abolished, there will be more suspensions, more expulsions and more court cases. I have known children put in court for stealing 10p. That is what the Labour party seems to want. It is disappointing and deplorable.

At the end of the road the administration of reasonable corporal punishment can end serious indiscipline. I am not saying that it is a cure, but it can bring things to a head and stop serious indiscipline in a pupil. It is reasonable to argue that corporal punishment is a deterrent.

On the continent the policy is to expel and suspend. That is a way of putting pupils out of school and it cannot be right. It is asked why we cannot be on our own in retaining corporal punishment. We were on our own in 1940. I do not see why we should be afraid of individuality. Should we do what Sweden does? Sweden is the only country in the world at present where five-year-old children can take their parents to court for smacking them. The Labour party is trying to take us that way. It appears to wish to see children aged five and upwards take a piece of paper home which explains to them that if their parents smack them they are to report them to the nearest police station were a summons will be taken out. The country must take note of that.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is easy to make facile judgments on this issue, but, as a matter of experience, many good and happy schools happen to have corporal punishment and many throroughly bad schools do not? Therefore, surely it is right that the judgment in these matters should be left to the head teachers, the educationists and the people in the schools who know best. Surely that is what the amendment is seeking to do?

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend is right. His long experience gives added weight to what he says.

If we abolish official and properly supervised corporal punishment there will be more unofficial beating. In schools where corporal punishment has been abolished there have been the most awful goings on which are undetected - the gym slipper, and so on.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: How do we know if they are undetected?

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman thinks that he has made a clever remark. He has been to school, as I have. Such things may be undetected in schools, but they can still be reported outside. I am talking of what happens in school.

Children can and do, as the hon. Gentleman has said, refuse all punishment. But in the end something must happen. It is reasonable to have corporal punishment as a backstop. It is fair between pupils. It is immediate and salutary and it can be right for certain serious offences. However, I do not advocate its blanket use for anything and everything.

School discipline cannot be decided at Strasbourg or Westminster, at county hall or town hall. It must be decided where it can be most fruitfully discussed, and that is at the school, between the head, the governors and the parents.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): If I do not recognise the problems on which the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) has been enlightening the House, it is because the problems simply do not exist in Scottish schools where, as my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said, corporal punishment has been abolished for a considerable number of years.

It is a great pity that Conservative Members, with the sort of experience on which the hon. Member for Ealing, North, a schoolteacher for 23 years, has just drawn, have not taken the trouble to see what has happened in Scottish schools since the almost complete abolition of corporal punishment there.

It was a pity that in moving the amendment the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) did not refer to amendment No. 165 which deals not with the position in schools in England and Wales but exclusively with the position in Scotland. Of course, the position there is completely different from that which prevails in England and Wales.

For example, Scotland does not have school governors. We have school councils, but the responsible authorities for schools in Scotland are the regional and islands authorities. In their role as education authorities they had before the European court judgment, the right to decide whether corporal punishment should be used in schools.

I have been close to the problem. The case that was taken to the European Court in 1982 involved a young boy from my native town of Cowdenbeath. His parents took the case to the court. I lived for about 25 years within walking distance of the factory that made the famous Lochgelly tawse. Therefore, I have been fairly near to the problem for a considerable time.

One of the reasons for abolishing corporal punishment in Scotland all those years ago was that the education authorities were much more enlightened in their approach than the House of Commons now seems to be in 1986.

Excluding those hon. Members who have had experience as schoolteachers, the House of Commons is at its worst when it is moralising. I am looking particularly now at the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). I hope that we shall not be given a lesson on morals by him.

As Members of Parliament with young families, we come here from Monday to Friday and have little or no responsibility for bringing up our families. We depend almost entirely on our wives to bring up our children. Then we try to act like experts and say what should be done to control indiscipline among children in or out of school.

I hope that when right hon. and hon. Members contribute to the debate they will pay attention to our circumstances as Members of Parliament over the years. When I came here, my family was young; I had to depend almost entirely on my wife and I would not pretend to be an expert in dealing with the problems of indiscipline among young children. I have been away from home from Monday to Friday for nearly sixteen years. That is the sort of factor that we ought to take into account.

Amendment number 165 would return the Scottish education authorities to the position that prevailed before the European Court judgment arising from the 1982 case. The Scottish education authorities would have the discretion whether to apply corporal punishment in schools. I submit that they have used their discretion over a great many years, and that has meant the abolition of corporal punishment. That is a clear sign that they have no need to return to the pre-European Court judgment.

7.30 pm

I do not know whether the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) intends to seek to catch your eye again, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to reply to the debate —

Mr. Pawsey indicated assent.

Mr. Ewing: I note that the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth is nodding his head. I hope that he will take my point on board.

I accept that the hon. Member for Enfield, North and others are in favour of corporal punishment. I accept that they are sincere and I do not complain about their sincerity. However, I profoundly disagree with their views. I recognise that the main thrust of their argument is: if we remove corporal punishment, what shall we put in its place? No one can come up with a hard and fast package to replace corporal punishment and guarantee that it would work. No one, including the hon. Member for Enfield, North, can prove that corporal punishment works effectively to control indiscipline in schools.

If we are to remove the system we must accept that we should try various remedies to deal with unruliness in schools. We must also accept that some of these will fail. What is wrong with trying and failing? By trying, we might find a remedy that will succeed. However the biggest obstacle to trying a new approach is the retention of the old system. As long as we retain corporal punishment in schools — the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth made this point concisely — with the cane standing in the corner to frighten the life out of a child, we shall not make progress. The cane on the table does not and will not work. As long as we retain the cane in the corner, there will be less of an incentive to try to find new approaches, remedies and cures. We shall not find the new approaches without removing the threat of corporal punishment.

I have not been convinced that the need for corporal punishment arises as a result of an unruly child or through an inadequate teacher. There is a fine line between these two factors. I do not believe for a minute that we should disregard the possibility that the problem is not so much about unruly children as about inadequate teaching.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): How would the hon. Gentleman equate his remarks with the degree of violence that we have all read about against teachers and the sheer terror to which some teachers have been subjected by children?

Mr. Ewing: I do not think that it does any good to overstate the problem. I have acknowledged that the probem exists. However, it is pointless for the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to use such emotive language in stating the problem that he presented to me in his intervention. His emotive language implies that such violence is almost a daily occurrence in almost every school in the country.

I trust that the hon. Member for Stafford will bear with me. This is an opportune moment for me to deal with one of the points raised by the hon. Member for Enfield, North. Pupils who attack teachers will not be controlled by corporal punishment. There must be other remedies and I would be the first to accept that. Those pupils

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): What kind of remedies?

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Member for Leicester, East thinks that he is being clever by asking about the remedies. I have already said that we shall have to try various remedies and that we must accept that some will fail and some will succeed. As long as we retain corporal punishment, we will be lazy in our approach and will not try the alternatives.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) for giving way and I remind him that I am the hon. Member for Ealing, North and not Enfield, North. In my experience I remember occasions when teachers have been attacked by pupils and reasonable corporal punishment proved to be the satisfactory form of punishment.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman cannot prove that.

Mr. Greenway: I most certainly can prove that. It happened in one case at a school for 2,200 pupils in which I had responsibility for school discipline. The House is entitled to ask, what precisely would the hon. Member for Falkirk, East do? It is no good him saying he would do this or that. What would he do?

Mr. Ewing: I apologise to the electorate of Enfield, North and to the hon. Member for Ealing, North. However, the hon. Gentleman wants everything in a nice package but that is not possible. Corporal punishment does not fit into a nice package. That is why this country is in such difficulty over the question of corporal punishment.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North will discover in the Lobby when the vote is taken, that this is not a Labour party versus Tory party versus alliance issue. There are many opinions on this issue. We have been talking about deterrents. I have been here long enough to know that the three-line Whip is no more a deterrent than the cane standing in the corner. The hon. Member for Ealing, North knows that.

My central point is that the education authorities in Scotland do not want to return to the pre-1982, pre-European Court position. When the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth replies, I hope that he will not press amendment No. 165 and that he will seek leave to withdraw it. It is significant that no Scottish Member of Parliament has supported the amendment. I do not mean that as criticism, it is simply a fact. I do not want to be accused of carping criticism, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment. If he does not, I hope that we shall be allowed a separate vote on amendment No. 165 as we in Scotland do not need to return to the pre-European Court position.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall be very brief as I know that many hon. Members wish to intervene in the debate. Left entirely to myself, and if we were not concerned with the European Court, I would substantially agree with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). I believe that corporal punishment in England, as possibly the punishment of last resort, should be determined by the governing bodies of individual schools. I would like that to be the position. However, I do not think that it can be the position and I do not believe that the House or any sensible person can ignore the decision of the European Court.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West) rose—

Mr. Hogg: The decision of the European Court has made it clear that, unless we respect what are called the philosophical views of parents, we are in breach of the convention. That leaves us with two choices. Either we have a policy of complete abolition as contained in the Bill or we have a system designed to enable parents to elect that their children should not be punished in that way.

The Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill 1985 was an attempt to enable parents to opt their children out of punishment. I served on the Standing Committee on that Bill and with the greatest respect to the then Secretary of State, I believe that it was nonsense. There cannot be two classes of punishment in one school. I conclude, therefore, that to discharge what is a duty to the convention, the treaty and the accord, we must pursue a policy of total abolition.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North says that these matters should be left to the governing bodies. In principle, I am in favour of that policy, but I do not see how governing bodies can achieve that objective and at the same time comply with the European convention and the European Court's ruling without providing some form of dual discipline within the schools, and that is not acceptable.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend knows that I agree with much of what he says, but for those of us who wish to be rid of this foreign interference and who wish to ensure that the British people have the right to make these decisions, for better or for worse, is there not something to be said for voting for a nonsense, in the hope that the British people will realise that a nonsense has been foisted upon them and that it is far better that domestic matters should be decided by this House?

Mr. Hogg: I am never in favour of voting for nonsenses, and I should be sorry to think that my hon. Friend is in favour of voting for nonsenses. Perhaps this demonstrates that the European convention ought to be incorporated in our municipal and domestic law, when British judges would decide the issue and I suspect, would come to a quite different decision. However, today we are deciding whether on the one hand to pursue a policy of complete abolition or, on the other hand, to devise a system that will enable parents to elect whether or not their children should be punished in this way. As that would lead to a dual kind of discipline in schools, which would be a nonsense, I favour the policy of complete abolition.

Mr. Flannery: It is very sad that we are spending all this time discussing one aspect of an 81-page Bill containing 61 clauses and six schedules. It is the biggest Bill since the Education Act 1944. We are devoting all this time to discussing something that was decided as long as 100 years ago in certain European countries. I have served with the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on many Committees, including the bizarre one last year which considered corporal punishment. It is unbelievable that any party could put forward such nonsense.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North referred to bad practice. There would be no bad practie if corporal punishment were made illegal. I taught for far longer than the hon. Gentleman did but he knows as well as I do that one blow in anger always begets another and that it often gets out of hand. The number of cases that have got out of hand would fill the newspapers. We do not come across many of these cases personally. Indeed, I have come across only one or two of them. What the hon. Gentleman calls bad practice is the actual practice of corporal punishment.

Teachers have to try to create a relaxed atmosphere, as best they can. In such an atmosphere, children have their senses wide open to knowledge and to the channels of learning. It is not always in the head teacher's room that caning takes place. Although I have not taught for 12 or 13 years, I know that caning usually takes place in the classroom, in front of other children, and that it is not recorded.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the House decided tonight to abolish caning it is unlikely that corporal punishment would be reintroduced and that it would decide the matter for generations to come?

7.45 pm

Mr. Flannery: Indeed. I am sure that that is what would happen, and that is what most Opposition Members, whether whipped or not, would like to happen. Earlier in these proceedings it saddened me to note that the Government Benches were quite empty, compared with now. As soon as the amendment dealing with corporal punishment was moved, the Government Benches filled up.

[Mr. Flannery]

A relaxed school atmosphere means that learning goes on at a faster rate than happens if children are frightened. Many sensitive children are terrified when they see a weapon—a cane—being wielded. Conservative Members may smile, but many of them stand alone on this issue. The hon. Member for Ealing, North referred to this country being as embattled as it was in 1940, during the Dunkirk operation, but thousands of teachers are against corporal punishment.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman was not paying attention. All I said was that we should not fear to stand alone on this issue and to be the only nation in Europe that administers corporal punishment. We stood alone in 1940 on a quite separate issue. I was not drawing an analogy between then and now.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman's interventions are always welcome. They spur me on in following the line that I correctly take.

The lengths to which certain Conservative Members have to go to justify this barbaric practice are unbelievable. They are driven from position to position, and their arguments become more and more bizarre. Eventually, they end up with what happened last year—a Bill that said to parents, "If you sign a document saying that we must not cane your Tommy we will not cane him, no matter what he does, but if you sign another document saying that we can cane him, we will cane him." Tommy and Billy then do the same thing, and the teacher says to Tommy and Billy, "By the way, did your mums sign a document saying that I could cane you, or did they say that I could not cane you?" What nonsense. This wrong and backward argument drives one to resort to all kinds of measures in an effort to justify something that is outdated.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: Other hon. Members want to speak. I know the hon. Gentleman's viewpoint. He has voiced it very often.

It is necessary to examine not only the question of teaching and learning, but the question of human dignity. The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) was ready to get the sjambok out for all of us if we disagreed with him over corporal punishment. I have no doubt that he would have done that in Soweto. Corporal punishment demeans the teacher and the taught. It demeans the society in which it occurs and closes the channels of learning.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: I will in a moment. The hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) was a member of the Committee on the Bill. Now he is on the Select Committee, and I know that he has a good viewpoint, although I do not think that he agrees with me on this. People who use the expression in loco parentis, meaning in place of a parent, are really talking in loco draconis. They are talking as Draco and frightening children, and making teaching and learning extremely difficult.

Mr. Evennett: I am always interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's point of view, because he had years of experience in the classroom. Those of us who have been teachers have all had experience of the playground bully. Does the hon. Gentleman not think that the playground bully might benefit from corporal punishment and that other children in the playground might be deterred from bullying if they knew that the outcome could be a touch of the cane from the headmaster? Does he not think that in an instance like that there is a case for corporal punishment?

Mr. Flannery: No, there is no case for corporal punishment in dealing with a playground bully, though I agree that we have to think carefully about how to deal with that problem. Later I shall come to the vexed question of what ought to replace corporal punishment. This form of punishment is far less acceptable than a wide range of alternative sanctions that are available. Many people would disagree with some of them, but the teachers organisations have issued pamphlets about this and in essence they ask for smaller classes, more resources, more teachers, better schools and more equipment—for all the things that mean more learning and more teaching. They are difficult things to provide because they are expensive, but they are the replacements for corporal punishment.

There always have been and always will be awkward children. The hon. Member for Ealing, North talked about attacks on teachers. It has been proved that where corporal punishment ceases, attacks on teachers decrease. The Inner London education authority conducted some research into this which showed that when the cane was banned attacks on teachers dropped. The director of education in Brent reported that the abolition of corporal punishment led to a decrease in bullying in the borough's schools.

There are solutions to this difficult problem. Some of the solutions and some of the problems have been discussed endlessly, not only by us, but by the teachers, who have to discuss them in the staffrooms and in other places where they get together. The Government propose to leave the initiative to parents whether or not children should be caned, but by doing that the Government are not facing their responsibilities. The responsibilities have to be faced in teaching, and the idea that one can have some schools in which the governors decide to have corporal punishment and others where the governors decide not to have it is unworkable. It is as bizarre as last year's Bill.

I think that a few Government Members support the stance that we are taking, and I hope they will realise that not only is corporal punishment a lonely business and wrong, but that it is not good for teaching. They should face the real alternative, which is more money for education.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) and I spend many hours talking about education. We agree on most things but on some things we disagree. I always find it fascinating to discuss such things with my hon. Friend against the background of the memory of Arnold of Rugby, that great educational reformer who did so much for education in Britain in the last century.

Caning has failed. It is an irony that in recent years when caning has been legal we have seen the most rapid ever deterioration in discipline and a growth of violence. It is turning the argument on its head to say that we must keep the cane in order to impose discipline and see an end to violence. I fear that many of my hon. Friends wish to perpetuate a system which 40 years on they claim did them no harm and which many of them preferred as a punishment in their young days. Of course they preferred it: it was far easier and more acceptable than other sanctions which they might have had inflicted on them. It was much preferable to loss of privileges, loss of status and loss of time at school. Indeed, it would have added to their status as heroes against authority. The sensitive ones among my hon. Friends — probably at their public schools — were humiliated. The tougher ones were beaten again and again, to the enhancement of their Rambo reputations.

Ever since judicial flogging was outlawed in Britain in 1948, the evidence has been growing, and is now irrefutable, that corporal punishment is counter-productive because it breeds hostility and resentment and legitimises violence at a time when we are urgently trying to reduce violence in society.

Parents expect rules and sanctions in other professions, such as the law, banking and medicine, to change and improve with the years, but some people seem to think that this should not be so in education, especially when it comes to beating. It is hard to find a single public school where the cane is still in use and any headmaster or master, will testify that the quality of human relationships between people of all ages in those schools has seen an enormous advance on days gone by.

Mr. Cash: I think that for some time my hon. Friend was a teacher at Harrow school. At least one other signatory to new clause 20 was a contemporary of his at Harrow school as a master. He has signed the motion in favour of corporal punishment. Can my hon. Friend enlighten me about the position that he and that other hon. Member took?

Mr. Key: I take it that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is talking about our hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter). Neither of us was allowed to beat children and children were very rarely beaten. Just yesterday I talked to the headmaster of Harrow school and he confirmed that beating is not part of the curriculum there. It is in the schools in Britain where the cane was outlawed many years ago that we have the most successful academic results and motivation of the pupils. There are a number of alternative sanctions which can be used.

Mr. Evennett rose——

Mr. Key: I must proceed, or I shall detain the House for a long time.

The quality of humen relationships which develop in school when the cane is not just put in the cupboard but snapped and burned and the advance that one sees in those schools are so great that those things alone would be enough to convince me that we should abolish the cane.

Some of my hon. Friends have said that the issue of corporal punishment should be left for schools to decide. The matter cannot possibly be left to schools, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education has made it clear that if corporal punishment is retained, one way or another schools will be forced to allow parents to exempt their children from it. That will create two classes of pupils, the beatable and the unbeatable. In a way, the choice facing the House is which policy to impose on schools—abolition or the ludicrous exemption scheme.

Some of my hon. Friends have also spoken aout the serious problem of assaults on teachers. Figures collected by education authorities show that since certain authorities abolished corporal punishment in their schools, there has been a measurable decline in the number of recorded assaults on teachers. For instance, in 1978 in ILEA, there were 62 recorded instances of assaults on teachers. The following year, the authority announced that it would work towards the abolition of corporal punishment in 1981. That was a transition time of three years in which schools could adapt to the new disciplinary procedures. From 1979, annual figures for assaults fell, and there was a drop of nearly 40 per cent. between 1978 and 1981. The schools that abolished corporal punishment included both those schools at which my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North taught.

I have also heard it said that the abolition of corporal punishment would lead to more pupils being suspended. The evidence points in exactly the opposite direction. Because teacher-pupil relationships are better in the absence of corporal punishment, fewer pupils are suspended than otherwise would be. This is not conjecture. For instance, the level of suspension has fallen in Birmingham, in Haringey

Mr. Radice: In Northamptonshire.

Mr. Key: in Waltham Forest, and, as the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) has said, in Northamptonshire. In 1984, its education committee reported:

"if any conclusion is to be drawn from these statistics it is that the abolition of corporal punishment gradually, and now as a matter of policy, has had the effect of reducing, rather than increasing, the number of suspensions."

It is also said that corporal punishment should be retained because it is used only infrequently, as a last resort, or as the ultimate deterrent for serious offences. This is nonsense. Both official education authority statistics and inspectorate reports have shown that in some schools there are hundreds of canings a year. Many of these must be for trivial offences. This was admitted by the Government in the 1985 White Paper "Better Schools", which acknowledged that corporal punishment

"is in many schools used only for relatively minor offences."

As long as corporal punishment is legal in some schools, it will continue to be used extremely frequently.

Mr. Pawsey: I have no desire to provoke my hon. Friend into the long speech with which he has threatened us, but does he not agree that the schools to which he referred are a small minority? Does he also agree that, increasingly, corporal punishment is being used more infrequently every year?

Mr. Key: I wish that I could agree with my hon. Friend, but the facts do not support what he is saying. He has encouraged me to insert a huge chunk into my speech of numerous examples of exactly what I mean.

Corporal punishment is still widespread and often frequent. It has been abolished by 34 of our 125 education authorities, and is retained by 91. I am delighted that my county education authority in Wiltshire has recently seen the light. The abolitionist authorities include those of all types across the country, whether they are county councils, London boroughs, Welsh county councils or Scottish regional councils. They are diverse politically, and include Conservative-controlled Berkshire and alliance-controlled Richmond.

I find disturbing the rules in the retentionist authorities. Some 84 allow corporal punishment for primary school children, 87 allow it for sixth formers, 77 allow it for handicapped children. Some 86 place no limit on the number of blows allowed, 80 allow corporal punishment to be carried out in public, 60 allow male teachers to give corporal punishment to girls and 89 allow female teachers to give corporal punishment to boys. It is an interesting concept that it is more acceptable to allow women to beat boys than to allow men to beat girls. Let us not go too far down that intriguing road.

Local authority bans protect about 3 million schoolchildren from corporal punishment, roughly one third of our school population. In Scotland, over 90 per cent. of the school population is safe from corporal punishment.

Maintained schools in England and Wales keep punishment books. These have been referred to, but generally without statistics, so I feel obliged to put the statistics in front of my hon. Friends so that they can judge them. Some 35 of the 104 English and Welsh LEAs have published statistics from these books. They show that in many areas, corporal punishment in schools is still frequent. Extrapolating nationally from the published figures suggests that there are about 200,000 officially recorded instances of corporal punishment each year.

For instance, in Mid Glamorgan there were 9,994 recorded instances in secondary schools in 1979-81, and 516 in primary schools. In Cleveland, 12,369 were recorded in secondary schools from September 1980 to May 1983. In one comprehensive, Dyke House comprehensive in Cleveland, 1,260 canings were recorded between September 1980 and May 1983. [Interruption.] I would be grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North would listen to me. I had the courtesy to listen to him in silence.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend is only reading from the STOPP brief.

Mr. Key: The STOPP organisation has the finest statistics available to prove the point that I am trying to make, so of course I shall quote it. I shall quote it even more if I am encouraged in this way.

Mr. Greenway: Make your own speech.

Mr. Key: I shall be making my speech at greater length unless my hon. Friend does me the courtesy of listening to me.

One could go on quoting examples, but certain themes emerge from the statistics that are unpalatable to my hon. Friends. First, there is a tremendous variation from education authority to education authority. Secondly, some children get corporal punishment again and again. The Cleveland figures show that two boys were caned 25 times in one year and another 24 times in the following year. Thirdly, children of all ages are liable to corporal punishment. The sad fact is that even physically and mentally handicapped children are subject to this. We have seen that the corporal punishment of girls is practised, but is less common, although by no means rare.

I referred earlier to judicial corporal punishment, which was abolished in 1948 because the Cadogan report of 1938, after a thorough study of young offenders, concluded that those who were birched were more likley to re-offend than those who were not. It said:

"as a court penalty, corporal punishment is not an effective method of dealing with young offenders."

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster) rose

Mr. Key: No, I shall not give way. I have already given way many times.

Flogging in the Army was banned in 1906, but was not finally outlawed in the Navy until 1957. Corporal punishment in borstals and prisons was banned in 1967. We should not beat convicted criminals, but innocent children are fair game.

The campaign to persuade Parliament to end corporal punishment in schools began in 1669, when a schoolboy presented Mr. Speaker with the Children's Petition.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: My hon. Friend said that corporal punishment does not deter. On one occasion when I was appearing in court, two probation officers were discussing that point. One of them said that his defendant was from the Isle of Man, where he had been birched, but he was in court again. The young man said from the corner, "But I wouldn't do it again in the Isle of Man."

Mr. Key: That may be so, but unfortunately for my hon. Friend, birching has been abolished in the Isle of Man. I am surprised that she is advocating the use of the birch. That is going a bit far, even for some of my hon. Friends.

The campaign to persuade Parliament to end corporal punishment to schools began in 1669 with the Children's Petition, which suggests that a teacher who "is not able to awe and keep a company of youth in obedience without violence and stripes should judge himself no more fit for that function."

Times have not changed in that respect. Beating is a dangerous form of punishment, which is not even successful as a means of discipline. We have seen that corporal punishment is counter-productive. Schools which use the cane have the worst classroom misbehaviour, the highest juvenile delinquency, the most vandalism and the worst attendance rates. The cane breeds resentment and fosters hostile teacher-pupil relationships and a negative and antagonistic atmosphere in schools.

None of the education authorities which banned corporal punishment has been forced to reintroduce it. The practical experience of doing without it in Britain and overseas makes it clear that corporal punishment is not only undesirable but unnecessary.

As a Conservative, I believe in levelling up. Few of my colleagues would disagree that the highest educational standards, the strongest motivation and the best discipline are still to be found in traditional schools, which they probably attended. Those schools have, almost without exception, ceased to use the cane. The parliamentary victims of the cane who say that no harm was done to them were lucky, because beating causes physical and mental damage to a significant minority. Of course, as I said earlier, they preferred it.

The last ditch argument is always: what, in the face of increasing indiscipline, can be put in place of the cane? During my 16 years' experience of teaching, without exception, the best headmasters, housemasters and teachers used punishment least and the inadequate indulged in it. Any teacher worth his or her salt will say that good discipline results from a host of complex, interacting factors and is not achieved by the simplistic hitting of a child with a stick. It is no good saying that we must get away from emotional language and that we must stop talking about beating, flogging or hitting children with sticks. I have heard several hon. Members talking about a sharp tap on the bottom as a euphemism for corporal punishment. We cannot quibble about the delivery of that punishment.

A rich harvest of alternatives to corporal punishment has been gleaned. I pay tribute to David Fontana, the senior lecturer at University college, Cardiff for stating the best practice for teachers in his book "Classroom Control". The book encapsulates the best practice of all those, perhaps good, schoolmasters who taught Tory Back-Bench Members all those years ago—those hon. Members who ask constantly what can be put in place of the cane. I refer them to that book. I even refer my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster to it. I wish that she would read it and discover the alternatives to corporal punishment. The book encapsulates the best teaching practice.

What is that best practice? It means good schools, where rules are few but are clear and are consistently applied. It means rules that are subject to change and development and a school with clear and efficient lines of communications between pupils and teachers at all levels and between the staff. It also means decisions which are taken by the head and staff in a way which is never arbitrary but is related to the need for children to learn standards and values. Such a school will have a positive purpose which is sensitive to all the ability-related differences between the children and to cultural factors.

If the small print of the problems facing us bores my hon. Friends, I must say that frequently many of them say, "What will you put in its place?" We must put those measures in the place of corporal punishment. If something is to be put in the place of corporal punishment, it is the teachers who will do it and it is their experience and good will upon which we must, to a large extent, rely.

Most punishment arouses negative feelings in a child and usually draws attention to bad behaviour. Praise and encouragement are accepted and practised by parents and teachers. Teachers may add material rewards such as good marks, term reports, house points, privileges and special responsibilities, all of which are immediate, realistic, consistent and attractive to children. The withdrawal of those privileges and the denial of time are among the most effective sanctions available to a teacher. The ridiculous fantasies creeping into our schools, such as the abandonment of egg-and-spoon races and the absurdity of denigrating football as a sport and calling it an invasion game, do nothing to help discipline any more than the abandoning of school uniform.

8.15 pm

As ex-pupils and as parents, hon. Members know that teachers should be confident, careful, consistent, fair, aware and firm. They should set realistic standards and should, above all, enjoy teaching. Sarcasm and humiliation in the classroom elicit nothing but rudeness and disobedience. If we wish our teachers to carry prestige and status and deliver to our children their educational birthright, we must look to the ACAS talks now in progress to set us on the road beyond the tragic dispute that we have experienced, and to the Secretary of State to implement the new partnership envisaged by the Bill, which I warmly congratulate the Government on introducing.

Mrs. Elizabeth Shields (Ryedale): I agree with the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). I, like many other hon. Members, have been in the teaching profession, and I may have a little more experience than some. During the past 10 years I have taught in a mixed comprehensive school. During that period the use of the cane, which was never frequent, has become even less frequent. There are alternative ways of correcting children. There are no complete answers to the problems set by disruptive children. We must work those things out as we go along. There are positive ways of considering the problem but corporal punishment is a negative way, as it tends to breed resentment.

If one uses suspension, there is a cooling-off period. A child who is out of school for three or five days gets bored and wishes to return to the school environment, because he has been away from his friends. That is much preferable to, and more positive than, corporal punishment.

Many in the teaching profession, and most of the unions, now believe that corporal punishment should be phased out, on the ground that it is ineffectual and does not produce the results claimed. To retain it on a voluntary basis would create an almost impossible position in many schools. It would be divisive, in that different pupils would be punished differently for the same offence.

I wonder whether those hon. Members who are in favour of corporal punishment would be willing to accept it if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or Mr. Speaker, were to decide that you could inflict it when the House is noisy and when hon. Members are not listening to the Opposition.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): I did not wish to intervene but there is one argument to which I feel I must draw attention. The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) said that the school in which she had taught had corporal punishment, but that its use had diminished, and that she foresaw a time when it would be phased out. I do not disagree with that general approach, but it seems that the people involved in education must make decisions for themselves.

I would prefer, and I intend to vote on this basis, that schools should decide for themselves in conjunction with the governors. However, I do not wish to argue that point tonight as much passion has been devoted to it and the arguments made on both sides of the House have gone over the top.

There is freedom of manoeuvre in this House and it is wrong for hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), who unfortunately is not in his place, to suggest that we are constrained by the European Court of Human Rights. We are neither legally for morally obliged to make this change tonight. I say that as, I think, the only Conservative Member to vote against the last Education Bill, because it is nonsense. I do not take the view adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), which is that the more nonsense we vote for, the better. On the whole it is better to vote against it if possible.

I have often made my next point, and I know that it is a failing cause, although it should be put on the record.

[Mr. Fred Silvester]

The treaty that gives authority to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg has never been debated or voted upon in the House. Therefore, there is no moral obligation on this Parliament. It happens that because the original derived from a treaty, it passes through the House under the Ponsonby rules, and was therefore not subject to debate. All Governments have failed to bring this matter to the House, even though they have an opportunity to do so everyfive years when the right to make private petitions to the court is brought up for renewal.

Thus there is no moral obligation, although the question whether there is a legal obligation is more complex. I shall outline what I believe to be the position. The Government have entered into a treaty. They are undoubtedly bound by the decisions of the court. However, this Parliament cannot be bound by the court's decisions. It remains a sovereign Parliament and can pass what laws it pleases. The Government come to Parliament to put the case for a change in the law so that they are not embarrassed by cases that go before the court. Thus, we are talking about the Government's embarrassment, and it is not up to this Parliament to bail them out unless the Government come to us with a proposition that we can accept in its own right. So far, the Government have not come to us with such a proposition.

As has been pointed out, the Government came to us with a ludicrous proposition. On that occasion, many of my hon. Friends thought it appropriate to vote for that nonsense, although I did not. I do not propose to vote for this nonsense either. If the European Court of Human Rights believes that a person who has a philosophical objection to having his child beaten should be protected, why, as is the case in my constituency, do 80 per cent. or more of the parents involved in some schools believe that it is to their children's advantage to be brought up in the disciplined atmosphere of a school that still has that sanction, and why should they not be able to have that right exercised?

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) keeps saying that I am talking about the impossible. But if he is anxious to reconcile the decision of the European Court of Human Rights, there is one clear and obvious solution. If the schools are left to decide for themselves, parents can choose which school to send their children to. The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) would no doubt say that fewer and fewer schools would retain corporal punishment. Indeed, if the argument is convincing, more and more parents would choose to send their children to schools that did not have corporal punishment.

Mr. Budgen: What would happen if a parent sent his child to a school and then changed his mind just before the child was about to be beaten? If the child was beaten, the parent might go off to the European Court of Human Rights on the basis that his right not to have his child beaten had been infringed by the school and that the British Government had, in effect, reneged on an order from the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Silvester: My hon. Friend has made his reputation in the House by thinking up extreme examples in order to ridicule Bills. Indeed, he is fairly good at it. But I do not for a moment believe that any court would regard that as responsible behaviour by a citizen who had been given the opportunity to choose his school. I think that my hon. Friend understands that point.

My hon. Friends may believe and vote as they wish on this matter, but there is no constraint on them to take one decision or another as a result of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): In trying to avoid what others have described as the mess of previous legislation and of attempts to deal with this issue, the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) suggested that responsibility should lie with the parents and that there should be absolute parental choice. In other words, he believes that parents should be able to choose between a school that inflicts corporal punishment and one that does not.

Mr. Silvester: I was talking about the parents, governors and teachers who are responsible for a particular school.

Mr. Fatchett: I accept that intervention, although it rather changes the hon. Gentleman's argument. I was going to say that parental choice would not be absolute in terms of the amendment, or in practice. From our constituency experience we all know that there are substantial constraints on choice, in the form of school catchment areas, school buildings, school sizes, and so on. Consequently parents cannot exercise any absolute choice. I think that it was the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) who said that we had two choices: to go for absolute abolition, or to allow parents to exercise their philosophical right to allow their children to opt out of corporal punishment. The hon. Member for Grantham then said that that was an unacceptable approach, because it would involve two classes of children and two classes of punishment. That strong argument has yet to be answered.

I am also worried about the possible damage to the relationship between a parent and his child. If parents are to be able to choose whether their child should receive corporal punishment in certain circumstances — I shall not use emotive language such as "I want my child to be beaten" — a dangerous wedge may be driven between them and their child. Might not a child say to his parents that other children do not have to suffer corporal punishment? I hope that the House will take the clear line outlined by the hon. Member for Grantham and that it will go for total abolition.

I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). In Committee, I listened on occasions when he was allowed to make some interesting interventions. I did not always agree with him, but tonight I almost totally agreed with him. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) turned round and said that we would only disagree with him in his passing references to the value of this Bill. We may fundamentally disagree on that point, but there is much agreement between us on the issue of corporal punishment.

However, I was disappointed by the reception that Conservative Members gave the hon. Gentleman's speech. It is a commentary on the modern Conservative party that it cannot listen to debate without constant comment or childish behaviour. The hon. Gentleman made a powerful case, and I hope that those who speak in favour of the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) or, indeed, the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth himself, will answer some of his points. As yet, no hon. Member has done so. I shall list the arguments, and I hope that those who speak in this debate will try to meet them.

For instance, why do we reserve corporal punishment only for the young? What justification is there for that? That point has not been answered. Why is there evidence that in schools where there are high levels of corporal punishment, there is also evidence of increasing unruly and antisocial behaviour? No one has answered that point. The hon. Member for Salisbury made that argument effectively. No one has answered the point that when corporal punishment has been abolished, there is no deterioration in behaviour and discipline. Often there is the opposite, in that there is an improvement as there is a better atmosphere.

8.30 pm

In the debate no one has answered the argument that there is a substantial difference between schools that have corporal punishment and schools that do not. If the evidence suggests any difference, it is that schools that do not have corporal punishment have the better atmosphere and behaviour, and the better disciplinary record. I look forward to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) dealing with those points. No one has said why no individual local authority that has decided to abandon corporal punishment has gone back on that decision. No one has told us why that is a historical fact. I suspect that the reason is that, when local authorities take that decision, they recognise that it is right and stick by it. During the debate, I should like to hear answers to those arguments, which have not yet been given.

Three basic arguments have been put forward for retaining corporal punishment. First, there is the ear-clipping analogy, that it is a good idea to be clipped round the ear by one's parents, the local bobby or perhaps occasionally the teacher. That is good for the child. It teaches him right from wrong, and is a beneficial process. That is used as a basis for saying that we need corporal punishment, and has been used in the debate.

Even if one subscribes to the notion that the ear clip is a good thing in itself — I am not wholly of that persuasion — there is a substantial difference between an ear clip and the process of corporal punishment. The clipping of an ear by a parent is a spontaneous reaction — an understandable reaction in many circumstances. The process of corporal punishment is a deliberate act of violence to achieve certain objectives and ends. One cannot put the argument on the basis of the ear clipping analogy. One must recognise that when one goes for deliberate violence, it has its own culture and atmosphere, and one must consider the implications. My argument is that when one creates that culture and atmosphere, one creates a set of reactions against it, which are not necessarily beneficial for our society.

The second argument is that we do not need the cane; it is just a deterrent. I have heard the deterrent argument in other contexts. There is a point in that argument when one has to say that if the weapon is a deterrent, one is prepared to use it. Then the argument shifts its ground because the weapon is no longer a deterrent — the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) used this expression — but it becomes a symbol of fear in the classroom. It is a way of frightening young people.

I have a very different view of education and the educational processes from those that are based upon fear. There is something wrong with our society, our education and our teaching profession if the only way in which we can provide education and learning is on the basis of fear. All the available evidence shows that if we can provide a different atmosphere in which people learn from each other and with each other, we shall get much better results. I do not believe for a moment that one can educate through fear; one can educate only through challenge, initiative and opportunity. Fear is not the basis upon which one enhances people's view of the world and their willingness to learn.

That argument falls, as does the third, which is simple. Those who want to retain corporal punishment simply say, "What is the alternative? We have run out of arguments and ideas, so we'll throw the ball into your court." That cry for an alternative has come from those who have spoken in favour of corporal punishment tonight. It is incumbent upon those who want to change the Bill as it stands to come forward with some arguments. The "What is the alternative?" argument is a negative but easy argument because the cane is the non-thinking, easy response that says, "It has always happened, so it must always happen." I do not believe that that is the right response.

The hon. Member for Salisbury gave a series of constructive suggestions. I make just two points. First, if we want teachers to do a job in our classrooms, we have to train them and provide resources for them to do it. We shall not overcome the problems that teachers face in relation to individual pupils simply by not providing the resources. We shall not overcome those problems by providing the cane. Teachers need to be trained to do the job.

Secondly, there is no easy answer. Resources will often be needed to deal with those of our children who are difficult to educate, but certain local authorities and schools, and many teachers, have experimented successfully in that direction. I say to those who simply parrot the words "What is the alternative?": go around the country, take a deep interest in education, look at what our educationists have done, and you will find the alternative. It is much more civilised, humane and effective for individual children.

In introducing the amendment, the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth spent a few moments knocking the other place. I hope that he continues to do that throughout what may be a relatively short political career, because there will be some consistency if he does. What he wanted to do in that knockabout opening session was show the House that he had an argument. The reality of his speech was that he had no argument. It was a threadbare speech.

I hope that the House has the courage tonight to say that we do not deal with the problems of our society by falling back on deliberate acts of violence, as are enshrined and embodied in corporal punishment, and to abolish corporal punishment and bring this country, not through legislation, not through the courts, but through the Act of this Parliament, into line with all other countries in western Europe. That will be the civilised way and a great improvement for our education system.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I am pleased to be associated with my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) in this excellent amendment. Tonight the subject for debate is discipline, or lack of it, in our schools. All that we are trying to do is to rectify the situation where some standards are falling because of lack of discipline, while the good schools are continuing to do extremely well.

My friend the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) said that I was liable to make a moralising speech. I have no regret about doing such a thing, because I believe that we are trying to bring discipline back into our schools. Good discipline in our schools breeds respect. I believe that corporal punishment, when used properly, and properly controlled, can bring that respect, just as good teachers earn respect. Of course one does not want corporal punishment to be used on every occasion. Indeed, teachers who have to use it on every occasion might be considered to have failed, but perhaps it is better to receive corporal punishment than to spend one's life having cold showers, doing 500 lines, going on cross-country runs or facing the ultimate problem of expulsion.

Our children should stay in school for as long as possible, so that they can learn and get a job after having had proper training. If a pupil is expelled the school has failed, but if a child is caned he has a second chance. There is nothing wrong in allowing a child that opportunity. It is a deterrent for children to be caned. I have had the experience of being in both the state and the private sector of education, and both schools had the cane available. Indeed, I think that I am the youngest member to take part in the debate—I did not leave school that many years ago. Without any doubt, it was better for me to be in school than out and about.

It is important to try to improve the standards of discipline in schools. How will corporal punishment be conducted? I believe that it should be conducted in front of the class and under proper control. It should be carried out in front of the class so that they know full well that a certain child is a miscreant. It is a quick way in which to deal with him. The decision to cane the child should be instant, so that he does not have to wait all day, queuing outside the headmaster's door, as we had to.

A record of the use of the cane should be kept so that there is no question of an illegal caning. It is important that the decision on corporal punishment should be made locally. In that way, the governors, the head and the parents are involved in a local decision.

On occasions, a caning can rehabilitate a child extremely quickly. Some people have said that a good whacking has done no one any harm, and I like to think that it has not done me any harm yet. I can remember children going scrumping. In the old days, the local bobby would take them to one side and clip them around the ear, but they did not go before the beak. The children were taken to their parents, who were informed that they had been scrumping. The children received the punishment there and then. That saved court time and, I believe, reduced juvenile crime. We have heard of some of the idiots at universities who have stolen policemen's helmets and cannot become barristers because their record has been blotted for life.

Of the parents whose children attend English-speaking schools, 63 per cent. favour the occasional use of corporal punishment. We are trying to make it available when a local school wants it. I am a governor of a couple of schools, and in one school a girl kicked a teacher in the stomach. I should have thought that that child could be sorted out at the school, but she has been expelled. Does that succeed? Instant discipline could have been used to control that child and would have ensured that she had a second chance. That is what we are talking about—giving our young children a second chance.

I do not like the idea of cane-free zones, rather like nuclear-free zones, so that one can shop around for a school that does not have the cane. I accept that if we have corporal punishment, some schools will not have it. That is not a retrograde step, because parents can move their children on to schools that have corporal punishment.

Mr. Fatchett rose—

Mr. Bruinvels: I feel that some parents are copping out and that some are unprepared to discipline their children. They are putting too much responsibility on teachers to discipline their children. That is not the best way. Discipline begins at home, as does respect.

Many hon. Members have referred to the European Court of Human Rights, and it is a big bugbear tonight. We are the United Kingdom, and we do not have to do whatever the European Court tells us. I believe that it would be better if we could forget what the European Court has said. The Isle of Man had the birch until the European Court interfered, and until then the behaviour rate had been considerably better than it is now. There is a British way of doing things, a British tradition, and that is lost if we listen to everything that is said by the European Court.

What is wrong with punishment fitting the crime? We all believe in trying to improve the lot of our fellow people and in making our children better citizens. A good point came out of "Better Schools" which in summary says that schools must secure good order and create positive attitudes towards good behaviour in all that they do. The effectiveness of schools in promoting good behaviour, and more importantly, self discipline, has an effect on wider social problems, such as juvenile crime.

The public expect little Joe or little Jill to behave better than he or she does, and this amendment may ensure that. We have heard a lot of what STOPP has said, and I recognised certain comments that were read out by hon. Friends. I do not believe any child has been physically abused by the cane, and, more important, the use of the cane has not been abused.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): The hon. Member talks about children not being abused, but if he looks at The Standard for this evening he will see a horrific photograph. I have two daughters in the teaching profession and I represent part of Strathclyde region, which governs more than half the educational population of Scotland. The region has departed from corporal punishment and my daughters have found that to be an effective and successful move.

8.45 pm

Mr. Bruinvels: We have already had the photograph in The Standard drawn to our attention tonight. I have read the report, and it is a shocking indictment. There is obviously a sub judice rule, and as we do not have the whole report we should wait and see. If the hon. Gentleman has listened to my speech he will have heard me say that caning must be conducted under proper control, in proper circumstances, and should be properly recorded. I believe the case reported in The Standard should not have happened, but I believe that it is an isolated one.

We must ensure that the standard of behaviour in our schools is acceptable to society. We must ensure that it is retained as a local decision, and that each head, parent, and governing body can decide on what must be done. There is nothing wrong in giving the head that power to impose discipline. Many head teachers want that power. They will not get a great deal of excitement out of using it, and indeed its use may show up a failure in the school, but it may have a shattering effect and immediately improve discipline. That is what we want to see.

Tonight we have a free vote on this issue, and that is very unusual. This is a darned good amendment, which will ensure proper standards in our schools. If the amendment saves young people from being beaten up and enables them to gain a qualification by staying on at school instead of being treated as a social failure, it will achieve a great deal. I support the amendment.

Mr. Bell: It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). In his private life he is a magnanimous person but he finds himself in the Chamber defending causes which must be difficult to defend.

I think he has been overtaken by events. Earlier the hon. Gentleman said that he did not believe there was an abuse of the caning procedure. He had to be referred to the article in tonight's London Standard, which is a clear abuse of that procedure. The hon. Gentleman sought refuge in the law of sub judice but there is no sub judice about this case, as no court action is pending. Therefore, we are entitled to refer to the photograph in The London Standard and to refer to this example of the worst aspects of caning.

We have heard a great deal of anecdotal evidence. The hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) referred to an anecdotal experience when she was a magistrate. She said that someone from the Isle of Man said that he would not repeat an offence because of the birch. Such anecdotal evidence does not add to the argument. I believe the argument has been cogently put tonight and I believe that those who are against corporal punishment have won the argument. It is my intention to seek to assist the House in voting so that if the argument has been won on the Floor of the House, the vote may also be won in the Division Lobby.

I was the vice-chairman of the Newcastle education committee when it abolished corporal punishment in 1982. The Committee did so against great local opposition and against a referendum which had been enacted by the bureaucracy in education in Newcastle. That referendum sought to show that 82 per cent. of those who were canvassed believed in corporal punishment. We on Newcastle city council took our decision seriously and we abolished corporal punishment. Newcastle's system of education has been much improved and discipline has not lapsed. Indeed, we now have a better system of discipline in Newcastle than we had before.

I was quite startled by the figures that the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) gave. He mentioned Cleveland, which is my county, and high levels of corporal punishment there. I hope that the figures have diminished since 1983 and that caning is now rare. I am aware that the education committee there has gone to some lengths to ameliorate matters.

The hon. Member for Salisbury also took us through the historic arguments. Anybody who reads the memoirs of Lord Curzon will realise the impact that severe caning had on him and how it affected his approach to life. We also know what canings did to Winston Churchill. I am sure that St. John's, Leatherhead, the school of the hon. Member for Leicester, East, will be pleased to see him here tonight, caning or otherwise. We know that caning leaves deep mental and physical impressions on those who are subjected to it. It is clear what psychological effect regular beatings had on Lord Curzon. The hon. Member for Salisbury said that judicial flogging ended in 1948. We hope to end caning tonight.

We have had a great deal of argument about the European Court of Human Rights. The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) took an astonishing approach. He seemed to say that morality and law could be distinguished, that law is not based on morality and that the fact that we have signed the European Convention on Human Rights does not oblige us morally to follow the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. Signing that convention means that we are honour bound and legally bound to follow the Court's decisions.

Since the 1982 decision involving Campbell and Cosans, the Government have not come to terms with the moral dilemma or with the legal obligation to make corporal punishment illegal. The result is that we are debating the Bill. The Secretary of State believes that these matters should be left to governing bodies and heads. He has not mentioned pupils. It is for the Government to take a moral stand. They must take account of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights and stop the present dual system of discipline in schools. The Government are obliged to take the lead and not to try to hedge their bets with some of their Back Benchers.

Corporal punishment is not necessary. Other systems of discipline have been referred to. The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) mentioned France, where social security payments are withheld for truancy. The French have said that that punishment is used only rarely. Corporal punishment has, however, been abolished in France and the Republic of Ireland. Other means of dealing with discipline problems have been found.

Mr. Pawsey: When the hon. Gentleman says that the penalty in France is not used frequently, is he not underlining the case for the cane, in that both have a deterrent effect? Neither has to be used frequently for there to be a deterrent effect.

Mr. Bell: We have heard a great deal about deterrent effect. There is no way in which to show that corporal punishment has a deterrent effect. I was subjected to corporal punishment at school, and it did not deter me—it made me more obtuse and difficult. I was a less good pupil as a result. Some teacher counselling would have had a much greater impact. I say that in no sense of recrimination against the school—it was the logic of the time—but it did not do me any good.

We have won the argument in favour of abolishing corporal punishment, and I hope that we win the vote. This has been an interesting and useful debate. It has had its historical analogies and its anecdotal evidence. We have had arguments for and against, in the best traditions of the House. The House has a free vote tonight. The Opposition are whipped because we strongly oppose corporal punishment, but the House has a unique opportunity at this late stage in the session to make a mark and to get rid of corporal punishment and thus a dual system of discipline. We can make it clear to every school, every headmaster, every board of governors and every education committee what their obligations are. Other forms of discipline can be found. That would be in the interests of pupils, who have been referred to least during the debate. I will gladly vote for the abolition of corporal punishment, and I urge the House to do the same.

Mr. Evennett: In view of the length of the debate and the lateness of the hour, I shall be extremely brief.

This is an important issue, but it is not as important as many other education issues which we could have debated, such as standards, finance and excellence. I am a product of a grammar school, as many Conservative Members are, and a former teacher. Experiences in the public school system are not really relevant to the majority of people, because 95 per cent. of children go to state schools. We must never forget that the public school system, excellent though it is, has the ultimate right to expel pupils who are badly behaved or who commit indiscipline. It is not so easy in the state system. Where can they be expelled to from there?

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Australia.

Mr. Evennett: My support for the retention of corporal punishment rests on two principles. First, I believe that the majority of parents in this country and certainly in my part of the country favour the retention of corporal punishment. Secondly, we have heard about certain offences in schools such as assaults on teachers and bullying fellow pupils in the playground, which I believe are extremely serious and deserve serious punishment. I believe that in such cases the cane can be effective both as a deterrent and as a punishment.

Members have referred to the article in The London Standard today. No-one would support such rare but well-publicised abuses of corporal punishment. The use of the cane must be reasonable and administered by the headmaster. It is for the school and the head of the school to determine what punishment is used for children who commit certain offences at school, and I believe that the cane has a very limited role to play in the modern school.

I am glad that Conservative Members have a free vote on this. It is interesting that the Opposition, who supposedly believe in freedom of choice on moral issues, have imposed a Whip. That is highly regrettable.

In my view it is for the head, for the school and for parents to ensure that the discipline in the school is adequate to allow education to continue. From my experience in London, as a parent, a governor and a teacher, I am well aware of some of the problems in inner London schools which do not have the cane and do not have adequate discipline. Regrettably, there are some schools in which very little education takes place because there is no discipline. It will not do for anyone in the House to pass the buck and say that there are alternatives when no one has told the people of this country of any real alternative. There has been talk of expulsion, money and other measures but in certain circumstances those alternatives may not be so effective as the cane.

Conservative contributions today have shown that we want a good education for all children in this country. That necessitates good discipline, because without it good education is impossible. Without discipline in the classroom and in the playground, there will be fear—children who cannot learn because they are frightened to go to school and teachers who are frightened to teach because of the indiscipline in some schools.

Regrettable though corporal punishment may be, I believe that its maintenance in the state school system is essential as a deterrent and as a punishment, but it must be used reasonably and rarely. I support the amendment.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I wish to answer just one point about what does or does not make a good discipline in schools.

Having trained teachers for 10 years, I assure the House that it is almost impossible to say what makes one teacher a good disciplinarian and another teacher a poor disciplinarian. I believe that good classroom disciplinarians are born and not made. If a teacher does not have any natural sense of authority over the pupils nothing very much will be taught. It has also been my experience that if a teacher is a weak disciplinarian the availability of the cane will not make that teacher a strong disciplinarian.

I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) because he has been a practitioner and in these matters an ounce of experience is worth a ton of indignant theory. A good many teachers in this country believe that there are certain marginal circumstances in which the use of the cane may make a difference. There are teachers who use the cane but are by no means brutal or uncaring. They use the cane sparingly and they openly say that they use it as one of the tools of professional control which they rightly see as part of the framework of professional responsibility in the classroom.

Nevertheless, we ought now to do without corporal punishment in our schools. Some of the circumstances have already been described accurately, because I have experienced them myself. I have seen situations in which a teacher wishes to take the lesson but can get no order or decent quiet. What is to be done in such a situation? I can assure the House that it is not the cane. That will not restore order, because fundamental indiscipline in a school is due to fundamental factors, and the use of the cane is only effective, if at all, in marginal circumstances.

In the old Victorian board schools, the cane was kept on the desk and physical punishment was meted out instantly. In some of our schools there is no corporal punishment because they would not have it as part of the ethos of those schools. I have been in schools where great use is made of the cane, and the discipline is very bad. I have been in other schools in which the cane has been used moderately and the discipline has been fair to good. I am saying that there is no correlation between the use of the cane and good order and discipline in a school.

Hon. Members are right: unless we have discipline—that is the old-fashioned but right word—there must be order and discipline, peace and quiet for kids to learn. But at the end of the day, a weak disciplinarian is not fortified by the cane. He or she will continue to be bad, and nothing is restored by the cane.

Conservative Members have challenged my hon. Friends to suggest alternatives, but the alternative goes to the root of the training of teachers. We must be much more careful whom we select to do this very important job. Part and parcel of a teacher's mental make-up must be that sense of authority that brings about law and order. If the wrong people are put into classrooms, we can give them a great bundle of canes but it will make no difference whatsoever.

We are debating fundamental matters. When we talk about the cane as an instrument of discipline, we are talking about something that is on the fringe of the problem. If we concentrate only on what good the stick will do, we shall have missed the fundamentals altogether.

Mr. Budgen: The House ought to be very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) for the careful way in which he set out the obligations that the Government have and the obligations, if any, that the House has.

The Government find themselves in an interesting position. In 1982, they were ordered by the European Court of Human Rights to abolish corporal punishment, but the natural instincts of the Tory party are to retain corporal punishment. The Government were caught between their treaty obligations to the European convention on human rights and the natural prejudices and views of the Tory party, and since 1982, have been delaying and tackling hither and thither in an attempt to reconcile two irreconcilable groups of people.

They now find that the other place has come to much the same conclusion as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), and has said that a sort of halfway house is of no logical significance at all, that it is a nonsense, that the best way to demonstrate that we are prepared to obey this order of a foreign court is to abolish the whole thing. Indeed, that is what the court order of 1982 leads to.

My hon. Friend the Member for Withington was absolutely right. The Government are under an obligation to introduce legislation which will cause the law to conform to the order of the court. On the other hand, the House is not under any obligation to be persuaded by the arguments of the Executive. We are in this strange position because the Executive is drawn from the legislature and it is difficult for a Minister to say to the House, especially to his Conservative colleagues, "I know that there is not a majority in the Conservative party for the complete abolition of corporal punishment, I know that for better or for worse the prejudice of my hon. Friends will be in favour of keeping this form of discipline, even if it is rarely used. Although I would prefer to retain corporal punishment, I ask you to vote against corporal punishment so that we may obey a foreign court." The Secretary of State does not say that. The Government must tack from position to position, trying to do the impossible, as, indeed, they have done since 1982.

My hon. Friend the Member for Withington said that I was being too clever and awkward in anticipating that if the House voted for new clause 20, it would give rise to further litigation. My hon. Friend may not have had the pleasure of dealing with many litigants. One of the common characteristics of litigants is that they are nearly as awkward as I am. He should understand that the Mrs. Gillicks of this world feel strongly and are often looking for an issue to fight for.

If the House decides to agree to new clause 20, some parents in future who send their child, for example, to a local comprehensive, will agree that their child may be beaten, if that child breaches the discipline of the school. They will do so in the usual inconsistent way in which many of us go along with things of which we disapprove, perhaps because that school is the best disciplined school or because they think that their child will do well there and go on to a good university. None of us send our children to school expecting that our little Johnny will be beaten. We all think that somebody else's little Johnny will be beaten. When their little Johnny is lined up to be beaten, they will try to withdraw their consent, but many teachers will say, "You have consented to your child being beaten and you can jolly well take the consequences of that because that consent will not be withdrawn."

My hon. Friend has said that I am too speculative about this, but if these proposals are accepted, some parent will go to the European Court of Human Rights and say, "You are a supervisory body. You have told the British people that they should abolish corporal punishment. With the usual hypocrisy and evasion of the British people they have tried to get round your direct order and that arrogant sovereign House of Commons has thought up some subterfuge. It is about time it was put in its place."

I hope that the House votes for new clause 20, and I anticipate that somebody will go to the European Court of Human Rights because anyone who has heard this and previous debates knows that people feel strongly about corporal punishment. It is almost inevitable that some parent will go to the European Court.

This is something which the House should decide. In future, when a Left-wing Government comes into power, of whatever coalition grouping, corporal punishment may be abolished. That would be a reasonable thing for a sovereign House of Commons to do. What is not right is that a Tory Government, against their instinct and against the wishes of those who elected them, should be forced by an external court to do something which goes against the present instincts of the majority of the British people.

I shall vote for new clause 20 in the clear knowledge that it probably will not stick. I salute now the future equivalent of Mrs. Gillick, or someone whom my hon. Friend the Member for Withington would describe as unreasonable—the litigant, the unreasonable person—who will take the matter to the European Court. Sooner or later the House and the nation will realise that this sort of sensitive and important issue is best decided here.

9.15 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I am sorry that we have spent so much time on what I consider to be a rather unimportant clause in what is generally a good Bill. I remind the House that earlier this week we spent two and half hours, and only that, on the fight against crime. Last week we spent three hours on the problems of the tin industry. Tonight we have spent over four hours on corporal punishment in schools. It is fair to say, if only to prove wrong the claim of the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett), that the alliance is not whipped for the vote on the amendment. It is for us, as it is for Conservative Members, a free vote. I believe that the majority of alliance Members are deeply and fundamentally opposed to corporal punishment in schools.

I am personally opposed to corporal punishment in schools. I do not think that it does any good. I have yet to meet an educationist for whom I have respect who believes that corporal punishment is a good way of combating indiscipline or making pupils better.

I have listened to the entire debate with great care, and it is significant that only a minority of Members they are all sitting on the Government Benches have spoken in favour of corporal punishment. The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) seemed to feel that if a teacher kept a cane in a corner of a classroom his purpose would somehow be served. Education by fear is not an acceptable way of education and I oppose it.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) seemed to say that a teacher should hit, but not hard. He felt that crime was best dealt with by violence. I have little faith in that solution.

The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) suggested in an intervention that if a majority of parents or governors wanted corporal punishment, they should have it. I am sorry that someone who comes from Burke's old constituency should feel that there is that special knowledge in a majority which wants anything. If we obtained opinions from the majority of people, we would find that they were against income tax and many other things which we, with our superior knowledge, know that we cannot do without.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) advanced an interesting argument when he said that a clip around the ear has never harmed anyone. For every 20 children who received a clip around the ear as a summary form of justice, half a dozen of them were not guilty and grew up with a deep resentment against the law, which gave the right, without any sort of jury system, to hit children, including the old-fashioned clip around the ear. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there was the odd child who became better for it, but there were many who felt, "That man has done something to me that was unjust." Instead of becoming good citizens, they became that much worse.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I wonder how many children, not having suffered instant retribution for whatever they were guilty of, have been led to believe that they could commit further sins—or indeed, crimes—and get off?

Mr. Freud: That is an entertaining argument. I believe that any child who got off was enormously grateful for his or her good luck; but he may have felt guilty. We would wish to encourage a feeling of guilt rather than to beat children into submission.

Hitting children is the easy option. It does not wash. I have yet to meet a good schoolmaster who favoured it. I refer to the speech by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who was by all accounts a good schoolmaster. Many years ago, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) made the memorable remark that there are schoolmasters who can do a brilliant job of work with a class of 30 or 35, and there are those who will have a riot with one dead rabbit. I believe that he was right. Schoolmasters who beat from a sense of weakness bring education into ill repute.

Finally, those who believe that beating or caning children performs some function should realise that that is not what we are voting on tonight. We have two alternatives this evening. One is to abolish corporal punishment. The other is to create a divisive system in which two children who have committed the same crime are given different punishments. We must consider not what we think might be good or bad but the amendment paper and the alternatives. I ask the House to vote for the retention of clauses 44 and 45 and to reject the amendments.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): In the city of Bradford there is considerable interest in education and in the issue of corporal punishment. On Friday, our evening newspaper, the Bradford Telegraph and Argus, published a survey of the views of a number of headmasters of upper schools in Bradford, including their views on corporal punishment. I was glad to see the Secretary of State return to the Chamber. He was pictured in Saturday's edition of the newspaper reading the survey which had been driven to him at a conference that he was attending in the midlands.

Seventeen of the 24 head teachers responded to the survey. Fourteen of the 17 did not want corporal punishment

"even as a last resort."

The summary of the survey's findings stated:

"the balance of opinion narrowly says today's standards . . . are at least as good as they were two decades ago. And if discipline is necessary it shouldn't be with a cane or slipper, say 82 per cent. But while Bradford Council takes legal advice on scrapping corporal punishment, only 18 per cent. want it kept as a final deterrent."

The survey also revealed:

"16 out of 17 say staff morale has taken a tumble since the year-long teachers' strike . . . 16 out of 17 say links with parents have suffered in the last year."

I believe that if we vote against corporal punishment tonight, many of those matters will be improved. Staff morale will be improved, and so will classroom discipline and relations with parents. During our debate it has become clear that there is considerable evidence that corporal punishment is counterproductive, fostering bitterness, alienation and hostility. It is the cause of bad discipline, not the cure for it. There is ample academic evidence to show that that is the case.

There is considerable evidence to show that pupil-teacher relationships are improved if there is an absence of corporal punishment. Certainly there is considerable evidence to show that in areas where corporal punishment has been abolished there is no sign of classroom discipline deteriorating or suspensions increasing.

We have heard from many who have come from teaching backgrounds in the debate, what many of us know from our own experience at school, that only bad teachers need to resort to corporal punishment — the cane and other means—to impose any sort of discipline or order in their classrooms.

We also know that teachers have gone beyond what is defined as reasonable and moderate corporal punishment. There have been many references to the case reported in The London Standard today. We also know of the cases which have gone to the courts where teachers have been found not guilty after beating boys with a riding crop; caning a 12-year-old boy to bleeding point for shoddy work, bursting a boy's eardrum by slapping him around the face, and caning a nine-year-old boy on the thighs so severely that a police surgeon said in court that "excessive force" had been used causing weals and deep abrasions.

Commenting on the survey to which I referred in my opening comments, the newspaper's editoral said:

"We don't want our young people to get on their bikes and seek work in Slough or Reading. We want them to stay here and help revitalize our city with energy and imagination.

But first we need to give them an education to prepare them for that task. We want to turn out people equipped to help the city to march forward with hope, rather than stand in the dole queue with despair.

We can't do that in schools that are falling down, with staff who are so demoralized that vision as educators is replaced by thoughts of an early pension.

We have asked often enough for help. Now is the time to demand that the Government raises its eyes from the Home Counties, looks Northward, and gives major provincial centres like Bradford the cash to repair the launch pads from which their educational systems, and their futures, can soar."

I agree with the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) that the debate will be seen by many parents as a complete irrelevance to the plight of the schools which their children are attending. The concerns of parents are with standards in our schools, their fabric and equipment, the sufficiency of teachers, their quality and pay and the quality of books available to their children. Those are the issues that lie at the centre of the concern of so many of our constituents about the education services that we provide.

If tonight we sweep away corporal punishment for ever, we shall have done a service to our schools. We shall certainly have done a service to our pupils in those schools, to teachers and to parents. It is time for the House to take a decision; and I am sure that that decision will be to abolish corporal punishment in our schools.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: We have had a useful debate, although I regret that we have spent so much time talking about one aspect of discipline in schools, corporal punishment, and not more time on all the other issues. I am sure that the House is united in wanting there to be good order and discipline in our schools.

If the amendment that was moved by the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) is carried, not only will the House have spent a great deal of time talking about one aspect of discipline, but a lot of school governors will be encouraged in the next few months to spend a lot of time talking about corporal punishment rather than talking about the much wider issues of good order and discipline in schools. I hope at least that the governing bodies will realise that they should give as much, if not more, time to other aspects of discipline in their schools rather than to simply concentrate on corporal punishment.

I must also stress that we are not really talking about whether we are in favour or against corporal punishment. We are talking about the problems that have been created as a result of the European Convention and the European Court's Judgment. The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) made that point. We have to face up to the fact that the Government have attempted to legislate on this issue. Last year, through the intellectual skills of the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph), the former Secretary of State, and the skills of the Department of Education and Science, the Government tried to find a scheme which was workable and within the law as it was laid down as a result of the judgment of the European Court. The House was extremely sceptical about the scheme and whether it was workable. The House of Lords correctly threw the Bill out as totally unworkable.

9.30 pm

The present Secretary of State is choosing to say that the Government, having failed to find a workable solution to the problem, will hand the problem over to the governors of individual schools. It may be that some governors will be more able than the Government machine to produce a solution. However, Ministers will be copping out if the clause comes out of the Bill as Ministers wish. If the clause comes out, they can leave it to the governors. However, very few governors will have among their number a lawyer who can work out whether the actions that they might propose to retain corporal punishment will or will not be legal. I would at least suggest that if the Government want to retain corporal punishment as a choice for governors, they should present governors with a workable scheme which would be legal. It would be unfortunate if governors spent a great deal of time arguing about the merits of corporal punishment and then found that they could not turn it into a workable scheme or that they could not gain the confidence of the teachers who would have to adminster it, because they feared that there would be a court action and the whole thing would degenerate into farce.

Good discipline in schools involves maintaining the authority of the school. Nothing destroys the authority of a school more than the uncertainty of the law and the possibility of individual parents taking teachers to court with the chance of winning their court action.

Conservative Members have referred to corporal punishment but have said that they do not want to use it, they merely want to have it present as a deterrent. Anyone with practical school experience knows that the vast majority of pupils who misbehave do not do so thinking that they might be caught. They misbehave in the belief that they will get away with it. A deterrent only works if they assume that they will be caught. Very few pupils who misbehave do so on the assumption that they will be caught. A very small number do assume that they will be caught but misbehave because they wish to draw attention to themselves and seek to be punished. There are other ways to deal with these pupils, and it would be foolish to make martyrs of them by using corporal punishment.

It has also been suggested that one survey shows that many parents are in favour of corporal punishment. I suspect that the majority of parents are in favour of corporal punishment for other people's children and not for their own. I once worked in a school where the head insisted that he should write to parents to inform them that he was thinking of applying corporal punishment to their child for misbehaviour. This was a most sensible procedure. However, he was amazed at the number of parents who wrote back to say that although they were in favour of corporal punishment, for one reason or another, it should not be applied to their child. The real test is, how many people would be in favour of corporal punishment for their child? I suspect that not too many would be in favour.

I would also like to consider the question about the choice of school. Conservative Members have argued that one solution to the problem is to allow people to have a choice between a school in which corporal punishment will be administered and one where it will not. That is nonsense. In many parts of rural Britain, these choices do not exist. In fact, we are getting rid of the nearest school for most children, the local village school. It is nonsense to think that they will have a choice of school. That applies to many urban areas. Because of the problems connected with walking to school on account of traffic and other difficulties, the idea that parents can be offered a choice between a school that uses corporal punishment and a school that does not use it is also nonsense.

As a young teacher I administered corporal punishment. I felt then that it was unsatisfactory and wrong, and I was not happy about it. I am still not happy about it. My excuse is that the ethos of the school where I taught put pressure on the teachers. Also I taught groups of 40 or more pupils. Most teachers do not have to do that today. But corporal punishment did not solve any of the problems.

Conservative Members have to face up to certain problems connected with corporal punishment. Is it to be administered because it is a disgrace to the pupil who receives it? If that is the reason for administering corporal punishment, there are alternatives to it that signify that the pupil is in disgrace. Or is corporal punishment to be administered not because it disgraces the pupil but because it inflicts pain? Major problems are involved if the intention is to inflict pain.

Furthermore, the alert secondary school pupil knows how to counter corporal punishment. He says, "It didn't hurt, Sir." Many pupils refuse to accept corporal punishment; they will not obey the instruction to hold out their hand or to bend over. In my early teaching career I witnessed some very undignified incidents when teachers tried to administer corporal punishment without the consent of the pupil. In certain schools pupils manage to glory in the number of their beatings; they call themselves the cocks of the school because of the number of beatings that they have received. That does not improve discipline in schools. Those who have seen corporal punishment administered in schools where general discipline is poor must feel as strongly as I that it should be abolished. We must try to teach self-discipline in schools. We must demonstrate to young people that they ought to want to behave and co-operate and that if their consent cannot be won a series of sanctions can be applied which, far more effectively than corporal punishment, will achieve good discipline in schools.

As for the judgment, I ask those hon. Members who are to speak after me in the debate to demonstrate that the governors could introduce a workable, legal scheme that would not create two classes of child, to one of which corporal punishment could be applied although it could not be applied to the other.

Mr. Marlow: Were this House to pass a scheme of corporal punishment, is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that it would not be legal?

Mr. Bennett: This amendment does not ask us to pass a scheme. We are being asked to remove the abolition of corporal punishment from the Bill. Last year the Government put forward a scheme which they thought would meet the requirements laid down in the judgments of the European Court. Everybody believed that scheme to be a nonsense. Conservative Members were very reluctant to vote for it at second Reading. However, the Bill made progress through this House. However, the other place threw it out. No hon. Member really believes that the other place was not right to throw out an unworkable scheme. If the Government were introducing a workable alternative scheme, that might be satisfactory, but they are not. They imply that the governors will have to dream up a scheme that is more practical than the one that the Government put forward last year and that is also legal.

As I said earlier, if the Minister with a whole Government Department behind him cannot produce a scheme it is a little unrealistic to expect individual governing bodies to produce one that is legal and workable. It is difficult to produce a legal and workable scheme. We have two alternatives: we can continue to leave it to governing bodies, and in practice that will lead to slow abolition after a great deal of time wasted in debate, or we can accept the clear opportunity to rid ourselves of corporal punishment and to take a major step in concentrating everybody's mind on genuinely improving discipline in schools rather than exacting retribution on a small number of people.

Mr. Chris Patten: There are two things on which we can at least all agree. First, we all agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) that no litigant could conceivably be as awkward as he. Secondly, we would all agree that this has been a long debate. I commend the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) opened the debate several hours ago. We have heard some interesting speeches; I refer especially to the speech by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) which was extremely calm and clear. I should also mention the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester). I agree with his comment about a number of the arguments having gone considerably over the top.

I said the debate has been long and some people might take the view that it has been overlong. I shall be as brief as possible, because I know that the House wants to decide the matter. I do not think that many of the things said in the debate will change the minds of hon. Members one way or another.

I shall speak first to amendments Nos. 153 and 165, which seek to delete clauses 44 and 45. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on Second Reading, every hon. Member has a view about whether corporal punishment should be retained as an available sanction. It is an entirely proper subject for a free vote and I am sorry that that view is not shared by the Opposition Front Bench. I have made that point before.

I emphasise that there is no question of any pressure being applied to any of my right hon. or hon. Friends about how they should vote. I want to stress that, because it was suggested from time to time on Second Reading. There were a number of winks and nudges and nose strokings going on, implying that there were free votes and free votes. I make it clear that this is a free free vote and I am sorry that that is not the case with the Opposition. I am glad that they have therefore found something on which they can agree.

The House will recall the recent history of this subject. Last session we introduced a Bill to give parents of pupils educated at state expense the right to exempt them from corporal punishment. That Bill fell, following an amendment narrowly carried on Report in another place, which in effect abolished corporal punishment. This session, an amendment abolishing corporal punishment was made to the present Bill in another place and this time the amendment was carried by an even narrower majority, of two. In Committee the Government have remedied deficiencies in the provision which was inserted.

Clauses 44 and 45 introduce five significant changes. First, they provide for the abolition of corporal punishment in Scotland and pave the way for similar action in Northern Ireland by Order in Council. Secondly, they cover pupils being educated otherwise than at school, and thirdly, they leave independent schools free to retain corporal punishment, except for pupils who are being educated at public expense, under the assisted places scheme for example, who would not be subject to the sanction. Fourthly, the clauses restrict the liability of a teacher who imposes corporal punishment to an action through the civil courts rather than, as proposed in another place, through the civil or criminal courts. I stress that this is where the punishment is moderate and reasonable. If it is not, the teacher, as now, can face criminal proceedings.

Fifth and last, subsection (3) of each clause provides for a teacher to be able to restrain pupils to avert an immediate danger of personal injury or damage to property. In those circumstances, the teacher must be able to use all reasonable measures, including the actions that could come under the heading of reasonable corporal punishment. Teachers need this important provision to be able to deal with outbreaks of violence and other emergencies.

9.45 pm

The House can take a decision on two clauses that, if they remain in the Bill, will abolish corporal punishment in the maintained sector in England, Wales and Scotland and make teachers who use it liable to civil proceedings. If the clauses are passed, abolition will be extended to Northern Ireland, by means of an Order in Council. The date on which abolition will come into effect will be laid down by a commencement order under clause 60. The Government would propose 15 August 1987 — that is, from the beginning of the school year after next, so that the schools affected have time to adjust their disciplinary policies and procedures.

However, if the House agrees with the amendments and deletes clauses 44 and 45, the legal position will remain unchanged. Teachers will continue to have the right, by virtue of being in loco parentis, to use moderate and reasonable corporal punishment. I should emphasise that we are talking only about moderate and reasonable punishment. If it is not, the teacher can be prosecuted.

Mr. Bell: The hon. Gentleman used the words "moderate and reasonable". What would he say of the picture that was in The London Standard tonight?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am not dodging the question in saying that that may well be a matter for the courts and it would be wholly improper for me to offer an observation. The position is clear about moderate and reasonable punishment. If it is not moderate and reasonable, the teacher can be prosecuted.

If the House agrees with the amendments, then, as my right hon. Friend said on Second Reading, the Government would look to the new governing bodies in England and Wales to make arrangements in accordance with the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights that philosophical convictions of parents should be respected. It will be for the governing body to work out with the head teacher and parents what arrangements will be most appropriate for the particular school. However, when the governing body has laid down the general policy for the school, it will of course be for the head teacher, using his professional judgement, to decide within the framework of the policy how to deal with each individual case.

The Government cannot accept new clause 20, moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). I pay tribute to his knowledge of these matters and to his knowledge of more positive aspects of education policy. We do not agree with the principles that the new clause embodies. The principles on which the disciplinary regime are founded are a key part of the conduct of the school. This is a point that we discussed at great length in Committee. The Bill gives a general responsibility for the conduct of the school to the governing body. It would fatally flaw this responsibility if, in the matter of the principles of discipline, the judgment of the head teacher could overrule that of the governing body.

I accept that the day-to-day responsibility for discipline should rest with the head teacher, but the availability of corporal punishment as a sanction in schools must be a matter for the governing body to decide, although in consultation with the head teacher, and taking account of the views of parents. Clause 22(1)(b) requires the head teacher to have regard to any written statement of general principles provided by the governing body, and it would run counter to that requirement if the head teacher were to go against the preference of a governing body not to have corporal punishment in a school. In some cases, the governing body, having regard to the views of parents, might be content to leave the decision to the head teacher, but that is clearly not the situation that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North has in mind.

Reverting to clauses 44 and 45, we would, if the amendments were carried, keep a close watch on how governing bodies handled the matter. In the circular which would follow the Act, we would explain to all governing bodies the necessity of respecting parents' philosophical convictions. That guidance will apply not only to the newly constituted governing bodies which were not in prospect when we promoted the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill last Session, but also to existing governing bodies while they continue.

Moreover, we should take advantage of the fact that, as soon as the Bill comes into force, the provision for the annual parents' meeting will apply to every governing body. Our circular would ask the governing body of a school which now applies corporal punishment to put the issue, including the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights, to the first annual parents' meeting so as to assist the governing body in reaching a decision which respects that ruling.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister make it clear when he talks about the governing body that that applies to England and Wales? In Scotland, presumably that function would be carried out by the local education authority.

Mr. Patten: Quite so. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East, in his admirable speech, put the position much more clearly than I could.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear in his speech on Second Reading that, in his personal view, the decision on the retention or abolition of corporal punishment should be left to the governing body, the head teacher and the parents. I share that opinion, for two reasons. First, some head teachers and staff face considerable difficulties in maintaining discipline. I do not believe that those head teachers who wish to retain corporal punishment regard it as the ultimate sanction. I do not regard it as that, but it is one possible sanction. Its retention or abolition does not constitute an issue of conscience of the first magnitude.

I put it on record that I agree with some of the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Withington on that issue. Many other controversies raise much greater issues of conscience, but corporal punishment is regarded by many knowledgable and responsible educationists as a valuable disciplinary instrument. We should not lightly deprive them of it.

I go further: at a time when there is justified anxiety about disruption in our schools, the abolition of corporal punishment would send out the wrong signals. It might be considered a weakening of the position of head teachers, which is the last thing we want.

Secondly, if we wish to strengthen the position of governing bodies and parents in matters connected with the conduct of the school—I realise that the Opposition are somewhat schizophrenic on that point, but that is what the Bill seeks to do—it would make no sense to take the decision on a matter such as corporal punishment away from governing bodies and parents. That would be contrary to the entire thrust of the Bill.

I do not suggest that corporal punishment should be retained if the governing body does not believe it is necessary. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) was not suggesting earlier that that was my opinion. I do suggest, however, that it should be for the governing body to decide. I am prepared to trust the good sense of governing bodies and head teachers and their willingness to act in accordance with the guidance we shall give them on the respect due to the philosophical convictions of parents. Those convictions would be respected, and we shall check whether they are. If that belief proved ill-founded, the Government would need to consider further legislative measures.

I respect the sincerely held opinion of those who take a different view, but, on balance—I repeat that, for me, it is a question of balance—that is the conclusion which I reach. I therefore support Amendments Nos. 153 and 165 which were moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth.

I hope that, if the amendments are passed, in due course my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North will not feel obliged to press his new clause 20 to a vote. If he does, I shall have to vote against it for the reasons which I sought to adduce earlier. I repeat that, on balance, there is an argument for voting for amendments Nos. 153 and 165. I am delighted that the Leader of the Opposition is with us tonight. On this issue at least he has united his party on a three-line Whip.

Mr. Pawsey: I have sat throughout the whole of this long and interesting debate. Speeches may occasionally have contained a measure of exaggeration and may have sometimes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) said, gone over the top, but in general they were sincere.

I was educated wholly in the state sector and so were my children. My experience suggests that schools know their pupils best and know the best method of ensuring discipline. Therefore, I remain convinced that abolition of corporal punishment would result in more suspensions, more expulsions and more detentions. Incidentally, there can be no justification for severe caning, as described by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). That is not acting in loco parentis as a moderate and reasonable parent would.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) called for abolition, but I doubt whether many Members on this side were convinced by his arguments. He certainly did not make any real suggestions for maintaining discipline in our schools. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) gave several examples of the improper use of the cane. But it is an exaggeration to say that two or three bad cases blacken the case for corporal punishment. After all, would he condemn the 400,000 teachers in this country on the basis of how 10 or 12 of them behave?

It is not true that a vote for the amendments is a vote for chaos. A vote for the amendments is a vote for choice. Does the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) honestly believe that an analogy can be drawn between corporal punishment and slavery and votes for women? On reflection, he may agree that he went over the top and was less than fair. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North made a speech full of conviction. He spoke with knowledge that is based on long experience as a teacher—[Interruption.] He rightly emphasised that corporal punishment was used only in the most exceptional and severe cases. As he correctly said, corporal punishment is the backstop that is used in our schools.

I come to the speech of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing)—[Interruption.]—who rightly chided me for failing——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman moved the amendment and has a right to be heard when uttering his final brief words.

Mr. Pawsey: I can take a judicious hint, but I must say that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East was right to chide me and I thank him for the courteous and friendly way in which he did so. I accept what he said.

I can assure my right hon. and hon. Friends that if they vote for the amendment they will allow governing bodies to decide on positive use of corporal punishment for themselves. The local education authorities will not be able to impose their will on governing bodies by using the articles of government. These amendments are about freedom of choice, discipline, and standards in education, and I urge my hon. Friends to vote for them this evening.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Education Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Chris Patten.]

New Clause 1

EDUCATIONAL MAINTENANCE ALLOWANCE

"The Secretary of State may by regulations make provisions requiring local education authorities to provide educational maintenance allowances for pupils aged 16 to 19". —[Mr. Radice.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Radice: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am afraid that I am slightly overcome by the victory. It is right that, in a Bill which has considerable pretensions, we should be able to debate important education issues. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will right hon. and hon. Members who are not staying for the debate on new clause 1 kindly leave quietly?

Mr. Radice: In the 1970s, the case for educational maintenance allowances was argued in terms of widening working class participation in full-time and higher education. The staying-on rate in Britain is extremely low and compares very poorly with our continental rivals. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members leave quietly, please? It is unfair to the Oppostion Front Bench not to do so.

10.15 pm

Mr. Radice: In the 1970s, we argued that despite the expansion of higher education working class participation had risen only marginally. I know that in my constituency a number of young people have been deterred from staying on at school or in full-time education. One of the main reasons for that is finance. In strongly working class areas such as Tameside and Durham, 25 per cent. of pupils with 5 O-levels or equivalent do not stay on at school. The comparable figure for leafy suburbs such as Harrow is about 10 per cent. Clearly, there is a major problem and it is related to factors other than ability. We seek to explore those other factors today.

I do not argue that lack of money is the only deterrent. Clearly, there are other factors, such as the kind of institutions that schools are, the prospect of other kinds of work and the youth training scheme. Nevertheless, there is plenty of evidence that the financial considerations are important.

The case for educational maintenance allowances is even stronger in the 1980s with the growth in youth unemployment [Interruption.] I appreciate that Ministers, reeling from the result of the last Division, have other things to discuss, but perhaps we could continue with the business. Youth unemployment is extremely high, especially in areas such as the north, the north west, Scotland and Wales. Youth unemployment in this country is higher than in many other countries. The YTS has also been expanded. I believe that we should have a youth training scheme, but the YTS presents a problem in that it carries an allowance whereas remaining in full-time education carries no reward at all.

The proportion of pupils staying on in full-time education is actually declining and is lower than in most other western European countries. We believe that those who stay on should receive educational maintenance allowances, first, because it would encourage more people to stay on and, secondly, because it would recognise the importance of education and the fact that its contribution to the economy is as important as that of training.

For those reasons, we believe that there is a strong case for educational maintenance allowances. I accept that there are cost factors and that in the first instance we may need to target such allowances towards regions or local authorities that are worse off or individuals who are most deprived.

We recognise that this Government, particularly in their dying hours, are not likely to accept the case for educational maintenance allowances — [Interruption.] "Dying moments" is perhaps a more accurate summary. However, even after the excitement of what has just happened, when we voted to abolish corporal punishment, it is right that the House should have the opportunity to discuss educational maintenance allowances as a trailer to the real thing when the next Labour Government introduce their own education Bill.

Mr. Chris Patten: We come back to rather more mundane matters. It is ironic that those who have tabled the new clause, who are usually so resistant to anything that hints of central Government restriction of local authority freedom, should now be trying to increase the control that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State can exercise over the action of local authorities.

Although we are flattered by the concern of the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) to increase the influence of my Department, we must resist the new clause. I see no need whatsoever to interfere with the existing discretion of local authorities over maintenance allowances for 16 to 19-year-olds. Our policy in this respect does not differ from that of previous Governments of both political persuasions. Young people in non-advanced full-time education have traditionally been regarded as primarily dependent upon their parents for financial support until their 19th birthday. As such, child benefit is paid in respect of these students, and local education authorities can add to this with discretionary grants—for example, to those in financial hardship.

This policy is sometimes contrasted with the Government's policy on financial support to higher education students, where local education authorities are required by law to provide grants. Courses for 16 to 19-year-olds at the non-advanced level are, however, much more concerned with meeting purely local needs than is higher education. The Government recognise that the latter is more of a national service, by paying 90 per cent. of the cost of mandatory awards through a DES specific grant. For non-advanced courses, local education authorities are in the best position to judge need in the light of the individual circumstances of both the student and the course—which may vary quite considerably—and to weigh this against other priorities within the local education service.

The hon. Member for Durham, North referred, perfectly understandably, to the post-16 participation rate——

Mr. Radice: To the staying-on rate.

Mr. Patten: I accept that paying maintenance allowances to all those staying on in full-time education might have some effect on the overall participation rate. The question is whether that would be sufficient to warrant the expenditure involved in paying such allowances. The limited studies that have been conducted suggest that the effect on the participation rate would not be that great, but we know that the expenditure would be. The net additional cost of paying an allowance of £27 a week to all 16 to 19-year-olds in full-time education—as recommended from time to time by the Labour party—would be around £600 million per annum in England alone. That would be deadweight expenditure. It would be paid in respect of young people who would stay on in full-time education anyway, and I personally can think of far better ways than that of spending £600 million.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman and I have discussed this matter on different occasions, and have done so before the television cameras. I pointed out to him on that occasion that to begin with this would not necessarily be introduced for all students and that it might have to be concentrated. Obviously, that affects the cost. It would not initially have the deadweight factor that the Minister has been talking about. He accepts that it may have some impact on the participation rate.

Mr. Patten: I am not sure how the hon. Gentleman would avoid the deadweight factor by introducing this scheme in a limited way, or how he would propose targeting it to avoid the deadweight factor. If he will forgive a moment of uncharacteristic controversy on my part, I find it curious how his price tags go up and down according to the conversations he has had recently with the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Sometimes his policies are more expensive and expansive than they are on other occasions.

The expenditure would not be justified, and we expect the participation rate to increase overall in the next few years when the number of those aged 16 and above will be falling, for demographic reasons. That argues the case strongly for taking a more coherent view of our 16 to 19-year-old provision in education and training. It does not argue the case for the new clause, which was moved in a spirit of euphoria by the hon. Gentleman, who was buoyed up by the proceeds of a three-line Whip.

Mr. Freud: One would have thought that the Government, having been let off the hook by one vote in the Division, would now lean forward to accommodate the Opposition and let some small, useful measure, such as the educational maintenance allowance, have a fairer wind than they intended.

The Minister said that £600 million was a deadweight expenditure in that it was paying children to stay on at school who would anyway stay on at school. He is wrong.

Mr. Chris Patten: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that none of those who would receive the allowance would anyway stay on at school? That is what the words "deadweight expenditure" mean.

Mr. Freud: No. The Minister knows perfectly well that there is a disincentive for many children to stay on at school. He knows that jobs for 16-year-olds are hard to come by. The average 16-year-old has three choices: to stay on at school, to go into training or to receive unemployment benefit. I am saying that without an educational maintenance allowance the financial attractions of unemployment benefit outstrip those of staying on in education or taking up training.

Obviously the great majority of those children would stay on at school anyway, but a proportion of children leave school for the greater financial security of unemployment benefit. That is wrong. The Child Poverty Action Group has looked into the matter, and there is no question but that the Manpower Services Commission would not now be doing a survey on payment to 16 to 19-year-olds if that were not relevant.

Staying in education involves a double cost for poorer families, in that they already have to pay for school materials, such as books and trips, and they lack the contribution to the family income from the young person who would otherwise be at work or in training. I hope that the Minister will consider, not giving away a deadweight £600 million, but formulating a structure whereby the most attractive financial option for a child will not be to become unemployed.

There is room for argument about the best way to act, but the case for some sort of allowance is absolutely clear. I realise that the Minister is at present discussing with the Whip what time he will go to bed, but I hope he will realise that for thousands of young children between 16 and 19 an educational maintenance allowance is crucial.

10.30 pm

Mr. Robert M. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Conservative Members have complained that successive Governments have maintained the existing system of discretionary awards to maintain young people who continue their education after school leaving age. I regret that that complaint has been made. It is true that nowadays young people find it more difficult than ever before to take the alternative at 16-plus-one which was available under previous Governments—of taking up a job.

I was a lecturer in colleges of further education for a quarter of a century and I know that the granting of awards by local authorities varies considerably from one area to another. The young person of 16 who lives within the compass of a generous local authority will find that discretionary grants are available. But if he lives in an area that is covered by a less generous authority, which wishes to keep down the level of the rates for its better off ratepayers, he will find that they are not available. In the north-west, the Liverpool education authority under successive party regimes was always more generous than Chester, which was miserly over a long period.

As I have said, for many years the alternative to further education, that of getting a job, was available to young people. In my constituency and in many others in the area which I represent, that alternative is all too often denied to young people. The time has come for something more than YTS. The schemes lack real training and at the end there are only Mickey Mouse qualifications. These qualifications normally have no value to most employers. The youngsters are denied the right to gain the academic qualifications for which many of them are qualified and acceptable to colleges. It is the colleges and schools which should determine whether a pupil or a student is to be dead weight. They will decide, because they have the qualifications to be able to determine whether someone is qualified or otherwise to benefit from a course. "To benefit" is a term that should not be confined to the passing of examinations because a young person can benefit without passing exams.

The discretionary grant system has no uniformity. Some local authorities, such as Chester, were unwilling to provide grants to young people taking O and A-levels on either a part-time or full-time basis. Since the arrival of the Tory Government in 1979, authorities have become increasingly unable, not unwilling, to provide the education maintenance grants for young people. The system has become sporadic and uneven.

The Education Act 1944 enabled local authorities for the first time to make regulations which provided pupils with the advantage of being able to take education courses without hardship to themselves or to their parents and to make the most of the facilities available to them. But discretionary grants have provided no surety.

It is no use saying that young people who may be the products of disadvantaged homes or whose parents may be elderly or disabled, can turn to social security. Very often, when young people who have continued their education full time have gone to the Department of Health and Social Security and obtained benefit, as soon as it is discovered that they have been attending a school or college—especially a college of further education—that benefit has immediately been stopped.

On the one hand, local authorities have not been able to provide all the discretionary grants that are necessary. On the other, as soon as the young men or women who are not prepared to sit complacently at home and receive benefit from the DHSS cross the portals of a school or college, they find that social security is not open to them.

It is nearly 30 years since the Weaver committee on educational maintenance allowances stated:

> "The object throughout was to make it possible for any pupil to take full advantage of the facilities for full-time education open to him. The value of a longer school life was recognised and, as a means of ensuring that full value was obtained from secondary education, it was held tha maintenance allowances ought to be related to the child's wage-earning capacity."

The committee felt that those were good principles.

The Weaver committee was set up to review a wide range of local authority practice and to recommend a more rational basis for support on a national scale. Nearly 30 years ago, the committee recommended that there should be educational maintenance allowances at a rate of £65 a year for a 16-year-old boy or girl. That was about 25 per cent. of the then annual wage. Today, that would be about £2,000 a year. The Weaver committee believed that there should also be £20 a year for other welfare benefits such as free milk and meals.

It is no use the Government talking about £600 million. That sum would be well spent if it were spent on training people for real qualifications and if we were providing young people with the wherewithal to widen their scope for work in the community when the day comes—no doubt only with the next Labour Government—when jobs are available again. My advice to any young person, even under the present Tory regime, would be to do his or her best, during a period of unemployment, to get an education. I do not mean the Mickey Mouse education of the YTS, but real education.

In Japan, 91 per cent. of youngsters continue their education beyond school leaving age. In this country, according to the national child development study, the figure is 71 per cent. of ordinary children but only 41 per cent. of disadvantaged children.

Mr. Chris Patten: The hon. Gentleman has twice referred to the Mickey Mouse qualifications of those who graduate from youth training schemes. I hope that he does not speak for the Labour party, because that remark strikes me as a disgraceful slur on the tens of thousands of young people who have acquired very good qualifications through the YTS. I hope that the hon. Gentleman or one of his colleagues on the Labour Front Bench will make it clear that that is not the Labour party's view on those tens of thousands of young people and the worthwhile qualifications that they have achieved.

Mr. Wareing: In the area that I represent, the youth training scheme is seen as the Tory party's attempt to provide slave labour for employers. All too often, progressive local authorities have had to step up wage payments in order to give young people a reasonable living wage. What better qualifications can YTS offer which national certificates, O and A-levels or even the GCSE which the Government are introducing cannot?

Whereas in 1978-79 only 11 local education authorities made no awards of educational maintenance allowances, in 1982-83 no fewer than 26 made no such awards. There is no reason to believe, from the cuts that have been taking place in local government expenditure as a result of penalties, targets and punitive grant-related expenditure sanctions against progressive education authorities by the Government, that the number of local authorities providing reasonable discretionary grants has increased.

The Child Poverty Action Group has recently shown that, of 72 local education authorities in England and Wales, 13 awarded fewer than 100 grants annually, and the average maximum amount was less than the then £5·25 child benefit.

The Government are not concerned with the general run of young people aged 16 and over. They want to return us to the time when only those with money in their pockets could afford private education and a public education for those over the school leaving age. Only they will be catered for. The real talents of the next generation are being sacrificed on the altar of the class prejudices of the Prime Minister and her minions on the Government Front Bench.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I support the new clause. I accept the Government's challenge that the Labour party's problem is that it has to weigh up the considerable deadweight expenditure, but my experience is that a considerable number of pupils in their fourth and fifth years at school are being pushed into working, in particular in shops on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Some of them are working to such an extent that they are not getting the full benefit from their studies. If some of them received an educational maintenance allowance, they might be persuaded not to work, which would then allow others who are unemployed to take on some of those jobs.

But if we have a problem in justifying what is called the deadweight cost, the Government must address themselves to the problem that not enough youngsters who get good qualifications are staying in education.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Loughborough): The hon. Gentleman has posed a real problem. Is the Labour Front Bench committing the next Labour Government to the immediate introduction of educational maintenance allowance of the type that has been described as desirable and something that should happen?

Mr. Bennett: It is clear that we are committed to introducing educational maintenance allowances. We are firmly exploring the practicalities of those and the problem that the Government addresses, which is that they are expensive. We accept that, and that is why we are looking for solutions. Just as the Opposition are looking at ways of meeting those costs, the Government must offer an alternative and perhaps a cheaper way of solving the first problem which is that many youngsters who receive good qualifications at 16 do not stay on at school. In my constituency, 24 per cent. of those who received five or more O-levels and who would benefit from remaining in full time education, leave. That is a brain drain which the country cannot afford. We must find solutions to persuade the majority of those youngsters to stay on at school or at college to further develop their skills and abilities for their benefit and for the benefit of the country.

Clearly there are not enough youngsters from working class backgrounds staying on in education. The Government must also consider the fact that until 1983, more youngsters remained in education each successive year, while in the past three years youngsters have started to opt out of education at 16. There must be a reason for that. We believe that the reason is that if these youngsters go onto a youth training scheme—inadequate as some are and good as others are—they receive an allowance of £27 plus. They prefer the allowance to staying on at school.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) said, YTS is a Mickey Mouse scheme for many youngsters and it does not lead anywhere for great numbers of people. If these youngsters are lured away from education by the money, if the Government make YTS a two-year scheme and start to make the schemes work in some places in terms of providing qualifications, then more youngsters will leave school and go on to YTS. The Opposition will have to address the difficult problem of finding the resources for educational maintenance allowances, but the Government must provide an alternative solution to persuade more youngsters from areas such as Tyneside, the north-east and other areas where the proportion of those staying on in school is still too low, to stop on at school.

The Government must also consider the fact that YTS allowances are drawing youngsters into schemes away from school. I am certain that the House will return to this issue in the future on many occasions over the next few months. There is a feeling in the House that we want to make progress now. I suspect that if my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) can catch your eye Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the next moment or two, I am sure that he would seek leave to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Radice: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

ADDITIONAL CATEGORIES OF SCHOOL GOVERNORS

'The Secretary of State may prescribe one or more categories of persons who may be appointed governors of schools to which sections 3 and 4 above apply.'.—[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 11—Involvement of pupils in the governing body—

'In any school to which sections 3 and 4 above apply where that school admits pupils aged 16 years and over the governing body shall admit as observers to the governors' proceedings such members of the school council or other pupil-representatives as shall be specified in the articles of governance.'.

New clause 26—Pupil observers—

'Where the school admits pupils aged 16 years and over, the governing body shall admit two such pupils elected by the pupils over 16 in a secret ballot by proportional representation as observers and non-voting members of the governing body, subject to the articles of governance as may be adopted by the governing body to exclude pupil governors, from matters arising under sections 22 to 25 and 32 to 39 of this Act.'.

Amendment No. 2, in page 3, line 39, leave out subsections (2) to (6) and insert—

'(2) The instrument of government of such a school shall provide for the governing body to comprise equal numbers of—

(a) parent governors, including pupil representatives where the local education authority make a determination under subsection (5) below;

(b) staff governors, including at least one representative from the teaching staff and at least one representative from the support staff at the school;

(c) governors appointed by the local education authority, whether directly or on the nomination of a minor authority;

(d) (i) co-opted governors and foundation governors in the case of a controlled school including at least one co-opted governor and at least one foundation governor;

(ii) co-opted governors in any other case.

(3) The overall number of members of a governing body to which this section applies shall be decided by the relevant local education authority, providing that no governing body shall have fewer than eight members.

(4) In determining the size of each governing body under subsection (3) of this section, the local education authority shall:

(i) undertake consultation with the headteacher, existing governors and, so far as practicable, parents of registered pupils at the school;

(ii) have regard to the desirability of a broadly uniform size of governing bodies in relation to the following categories of size of schools:

(a) less than 100 registered pupils;

(b) more than 99, but less than 300, registered pupils;

(c) more than 299, but less than 600, registered pupils;

(d) more than 599 registered pupils.

(5) The local education authority may determine, for the purposes of subsection (1) of this section, that one or more of the places to be allocated to parents' representatives on any governing body of a school admitting pupils at 16 years of age and over shall be allocated to pupil representatives providing that there shall be at least a majority of parents over pupil representatives in that category on any governing body.

(6) No representative shall be elected as a pupil representative under subsection (5) of this section unless he has attained the age of 16 years and any such election shall take place among pupils who have attained the same age.'.

Amendment No. 3, in line 39, leave out from 'school' to end of line 20 on page 5 and insert

'shall provide for a governing body to include—

(a) at least two parent governors;

(b) at least two governors appointed by the local education authority;

(c) at least two teacher governors;

(d) the head teacher, unless he chooses not to be a governor; and

(e) either—

(i) at least three co-opted governors, or

(ii) at least two foundation governors and at least one co-opted governor, in the case of a controlled school.'.

Amendment No. 4, in page 4, line 2, leave out '(and no others)'.

Amendment No. 5, in line 3, leave out 'two' and insert 'four'.

Amendment No. 6, in line 6, after '(c)', insert 'at least'.

Amendment No. 8, in line 7, leave out '(d)' and insert 'who shall be'.

Amendment No. 13, in line 26, at end insert—

'(f) two pupil governors as observers, in the case of a school admitting pupils of 16 years of age and over.'.

Amendment No. 14, in line 30, leave out '(and no others)'.

Amendment No. 15, in line 31, leave out 'four' and insert 'eight'.

Amendment No. 16, in line 34, after '(c)' insert 'at least'.

Amendment No. 17, in line 35, leave out '(d)' and insert

'one of whom shall be'.

Amendment No. 18, in line 40, at end insert—

'(f) two pupil governors as observers, in the case of a school admitting pupils of 16 years of age and over.'.

Amendment No. 19, in page 5, line 3, leave out '(and no others)'.

Amendment No. 20, in line 5, leave out 'five' and insert 'eight'.

Amendment No. 21, in line 8, after '(c)', insert, 'at least'.

Amendment No. 22, in line 9, leave out '(d)' and insert 'one of whom shall be'.

Amendment No. 23, in line 14, at end insert—

'(f) two pupil governors as observers, in the case of a school admitting pupils of 16 years of age and over.'.

No. 26, in line 20, at end insert—

'(8) In any school to which this section applies where that school is a sixth-form college the instrument of government may in addition include two pupil governors aged 16 years and over, subject to the exclusion of those pupil governors from matters arising under sections 22, 23, 33 to 39 of this Act.'.

No. 27, in line 20, at end insert—

'(8) In any school to which this section applies where that school admits pupils age 16 and over, the instrument of government may in addition inculde two pupils aged 16 years and over subject to the exclusion of those pupils from matters arising under sections 22, 23, 33 to 39 of this Act.'.

No. 31, in clause 4, page 6, line 21, at end insert—

'(7) In any school to which this section applies where that school is a sixth-form college, the instrument of government may in addition include two pupil governors aged 16 years and over, subject to the exclusion of those pupil governors from matters arising under sections 22, 23, 33 to 39 of this Act.'.

No. 32, in line 21, at end add—

'(7) In any school to which this section applies where that school admits pupils aged 16 and over, the instrument of government may in addition include two pupils aged 16 years and over subject to the exclusions of those pupils from matters arising under sections 22, 23, 33 to 39 of this Act.'.

No. 59, in clause 15, page 19, line 25, leave out 'eighteen', and insert 'sixteen'.

No. 60, in line 26, at end insert

'or aged 16 and over if he is a registered pupil at the school at the date of his election or appointment'.

No. 180, in page 60, line 34, leave out Clause 56.

Government amendments Nos. 181 and 182.

Mr. Bennett: The new clause takes us directly back to matters in the Bill. It seeks to provide a measure of flexibility. The amendments that accompany the clause address the problems which the Opposition believe are contained in the Government's scheme.

We were a little unhappy that the Government, having passed the Education Act 1980, which set up new provisions for governing bodies, shortly afterwards produced a Green Paper in which they suggesteded conferring greater powers on parents in relation to governing bodies and reducing the powers of almost everyone else. We felt that the Government were rather premature. In producing their Green Paper they took evidence on the position that applied before the 1980 Act was implemented, rather than on what had happened.

Many people believed that the 1980 Act resulted in a very good partnership on the new governing bodies between parents and teachers, the local authority and the co-opted representatives. All the evidence showed that the Government had gone overboard in their attempt to increase the number of parents on governing bodies and that the balance was not right. We welcome the fact that the Government have sought to improve the balance.

If governing bodies are to work, there has to be a partnership between parents and teachers, the local authority and the co-opted representatives. They must work together. Unfortunately, because of the way in which the Bill has been drafted, there will be conflict. The number of teachers on governing bodies is to be reduced. That is not the best way to obtain their co-operation. There is absolutely no reason for the Government not to maintain a slightly higher teacher representation on the governing bodies.

We have approached this aspect in a number of ways. Amendment No. 2 proposes that representation should be in four parts. Amendment No. 3 proposes that state schools should adopt the same formula as applies to voluntary and state-aided schools.

The Government ought to allow greater teacher representation on governing bodies. In small schools, where teachers have only one representative on the governing body, there will be occasions when that individual will be unable to be present at meetings. Teachers will then be completely unrepresented. It is an advantage if somebody is present at meetings, not necessarily formally to second a resolution, but to nod agreement, thus signifying that that is the view not just of one person but that it is supported by others. [Interruption.] That is a fact. Governing bodies are concerned with obtaining a consensus, not with obtaining decisions and taking votes. Narrow majority votes on governing bodies—a win of three to two, or 231 to 230 — will not produce solutions. The Secretary of State seems to be amused by all this. My impression was that he was quite relieved by the result of the vote. Governing bodies should not be pressed into taking decisions as a result of votes. We want consensus on governing bodies. Greater teacher representation would help to achieve that aim.

[Mr. Bennett]

There has also been an experiment in which pupils have participated as school governors. The evidence is that that experiment has worked well. In our Second Reading and Committee debates the Government could not provide a single example of unsuccessful pupil governors, or of pupil governors who had caused problems. It would be worth while if the Government were to introduce sufficient flexibility to allow pupil governors to participate on governing bodies.

Many local authorities have also allowed ancillary staff to be represented on governing bodies. It will cause considerable resentment in towns such as Sheffield if ancillary staff—those who provide dinners, or who work in the office, or caretakers — are pushed off the governing bodies. That is not the way to achieve co-operation and consensus. A flexible approach would allow pupils and ancillary staff to serve as governors, and it would also provide for greater teacher representation.

Even at this late stage I plead with the Government to introduce flexibility. The reforms carried out in 1980 have worked in the majority of local authority areas. The governing bodies have settled down and in most cases have produced partnership rather than conflict. It would be sad if, as a result of the passage of this Bill and the removal from governing bodies of the groups that I have mentioned, we produced a situation worse than the present one.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I should like to speak briefly to amendments Nos. 10, 12, 15, 17, 20 and 22 which are in my name. These amendments would increase the number of parent governors and reduce the number of teacher governors by one where the head teacher chose to be a governor. The effect would be to give parents a bigger say. Indeed, the amendments would give parents the majority say on all governing bodies before co-options were carried out.

The route towards greater parent power is popular with parents and with people who are concerned about quality in our education system. I can see no reason why we should not have the courage of our convictions and decide to trust the parents by giving them a majority on the governing bodies. A whole series of safeguards are written into other parts of the Bill and for that reason the Government ought to have the courage to give majority power to the parents.

Parent governors already make a valuable contribution to our schools but in the smaller schools the Bill would restrict the number of parent governors to two. That is too restrictive because we know that many parents are over-awed, if not diffident, about the way in which schools are run. As a result, some of them get involved on governing bodies only when their children have been pupils for some years. By increasing the number of parent governors we would increase the scope and the opportunity for parents to become involved at an earlier stage.

I appreciate that, because the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is trying to pull the Government in one direction and I am trying to pull them in the opposite direction, my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to say that he has the balance about right. I hope this will give him an opportunity to explain why the Government do not yet feel able to give parents a majority say on all governing bodies.

Mr. Weetch: I should like to speak to amendment No. 2.

The section of the Bill that deals with governors and governor representation gives teachers a raw deal. I understand why that is so, but I do not understand why the Government have made no serious attempt to put it right. If this Bill passes without major surgery, governing bodies will emerge according to a standard pattern. I am not opposed to more of a pattern, but I am opposed to this pattern. The statistical pattern of representation on governing bodies in their new shape shows that, as the school grows, teacher representation will be at a bigger proportional disadvantage.

In a school with up to 99 pupils, the first category mentioned in the Bill, teacher representation is one, plus the headmaster. As the school increases in size to 600 or more pupils, the parent representation is increased from two to five, the local education authority representation is increased from two to five, the co-opted representation is increased from three to six, but the teacher representation goes from one to two. There is no justice in that and it is a poor way to establish, or shall I say re-establish, the partnership that must exist if education is to succeed. I am talking about the partnership of parents, the local education authority, central Government and the teachers.

Amendment No. 2 says that there shall be a principle of equality of representation, with "equal numbers of . . . parent governors . . . staff governors . . . governors appointed by the local education authority . . .co-opted governors".

All through, there is equality of representation. I know that in this world, one cannot get mathematically equal representation without some other distortion, but as the pattern of represenation exists now, teachers have a raw deal. The nature and numbers of their representation are unjust.

I shall not take too much more of the time of the House, because, unfortunately, I have already lost this argument. I was not impressed with the case that the Government put up in Committee against increasing teacher representation. I should like to hear the answer from the Minister, to see whether the Government have a sense of shame about the whole matter. The professional teacher organisations are dissatisifed with the gross under-representation of professional teachers, and have every reason to be so. One can see at a glance that this is unjust, and I hope that even at this late stage, the Government will put the matter right.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): I wish to speak on new clause 26 and amendments Nos. 13 18 and 23, which stand in my name. Through these, I wish to change what is already a permissive sanction of allowing student governors as observers into a mandatory one. To do otherwise allows governing bodies to object to, and deny opportunities for, young people to participate. For what reasons do they do so? Is it because young people have nothing worth contributing? Is it because young people have nothing to say that is worth listening to? Is it part of our educational philosophy to treat young people as irresponsible? Do we give them an education, and then say that they are not capable of using it in a responsible way? If so that is an indictment of the education that they have received. By making this a permissive sanction, we are seen to condone such arguments, which is why I wish that it were a mandatory sanction.

Perhaps if we had listened more to the view of students before, we should have done something much earlier about what is seen by many to be the irrelevant last two or three years of school life, and could have stemmed some of the disillusionment that has come from that. It is not unreasonable that the client group should have a say in the service that it is receiving. If it is accepted that pupils have a view, governing bodies should hear it.

Is not participating an education in itself, not only for those young people who are governors, but for those who elect the governors, and so all those involved in the democratic process? This is recognised by the Government, and has been recognised by my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State in his response to the Thompson report. He said:

"The Secretary of State believes that a service which is concerned with the personal development of young people must seek to encourage their involvement in decision taking, and in accepting the implication of those decisions".

At the first conference of Ministers responsible for youth in Strasbourg, recommendations endorsed by the Government include:

"enhance a dialogue between young people and public authorities at all levels on issues that concern their lives, such as education".

There was another recommendation to "encourage the participation of young people in the decision-making process in areas that concern them".

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, speaking at a conference on participation in November of last year said:

"I therefore stress my belief in participation."

Those are fine words, and tonight we have an opportunity to apply them and to allow young people to participate in something that definitely affects them — their education. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister referred to his dislike of having two tiers of governors or second-class governors. But If there are only two classes on a train, it is surely better to be travelling second class than to be left behind. As governors with speaking rights but no voting rights, as I advocate, students could make a major contribution to discussions on those governing bodies. They could make their views known to the governors who are making the decisions, and could thus ensure that their views are taken into account by them.

Of course there are sensitive areas in which student governors should not be involved, and that is covered by the amendment. It is not impractical to exclude student governors from such discussions. My hon. Friend the Minister referred to young people going in and out of the room like yo-yos. As the president of a students' union, I was heavily involved in discussions on university committees, and the matter was simply dealt with by having two parts to the agenda: the first involving student representatives, and the second involving reserved business, where students were asked to leave the room. I see no reason why a similar structure should not apply to school governors' meetings.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): When I was chairman of a board of governors I found that our pupil governors were only interested in the bits from which they were excluded, and did not speak on any other subject. Will my hon. Friend take that into account?

Mr. Lawler: It is a bit difficult to speak on a subject when one has been excluded from the meeting. As a student participant, I was often very interested in the matters on the reserved part of the agenda, but I recognisd that they were not entirely appropriate for me to be involved in. I think, for example, of disciplinary matters relating to students, or matters relating to university staff. That is why I seek to exclude student governors from similar discussions on school governing bodies.

I argue that student governors may not be able to play a full part but should at least be able to play a part. It might be argued that we need only have school councils in schools. I recommend setting up such councils in schools, because they have a role to play. That is particularly true for the younger pupils, as they give practice at participation and democracy. But all school councils are only talking shops. In most schools there is no direct link between them and the governing bodies, and no direct input. That is why we need student governors as observers on the governing body.

My hon. Friend the Minister has spoken about a yob society emerging from our education system. One factor that contributes towards that is the feeling of alienation experienced by young people because they believe that no one listens to them. They believe that no one thinks that they have anything to contribute. Consequently, it is not surprising that they feel frustrated. As Hargreaves said in his report

"it is clear from the fifth form survey that a further cause of disaffection amongst some pupils is their gradually accommodated conviction that they have no real voice in matters of school policies and decision-making pertaining to the curriculum, distribution of resources, the physical environment and rules and sanctions."

One important role of education is to ensure that young people do not feel alienated and are taught how to be involved in decision-making processes and are allowed to get the most out of them.

In that way the governing bodies too would have much to gain, because they would have the benefit of young people participating.

My hon. Friend the Minister has already accepted most of my points.

As he said in Committee:

"I stress that we recognise that it is desirable for senior pupils to be involved in the work of a governing body". — [Official Report, Standing Committee B, 19 June 1986; c. 86.]

If my hon. Friend recognises that it is important that young people should be involved as observers in the role of our governing bodies, he should ask all schools to participate. Governing bodies and young people will benefit from the contribution that they have to make.

Mr. Freud: The lead new clause of this group is new clause 3, on additional categories of governors. Those of us who were fortunate enough to serve on the Committee, and who spent 15 sessions arguing about that, very much welcome the new voices that we hear on Report. I have considerable sympathy for the new clause that has just been spoken to by the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler).

The alliance position is that, while involvement and institution-based governorships are all very well and much better than nothing, the fundamental principle should be that of qualification by age. Although new clause 11 argues for involvement only and amendment Nos. 26 and 31 argue for governors in sixth form colleges, they are not the most desirable positions, although perhaps the best that we are able to get.

Our argument is that, having accepted the principle of pupil governorship in our own amendments to clause 56, on pupil governorship in colleges of further education, the Minister of State should apply the principle consistently throughout education. That consistency should either be on the principle of common factors between institutions as the basis, or of age as the basis. I do not believe that one FE college should have it, and, in the same town, a comprehensive or sixth form college should not.

It is illogical if some 16-year-olds are eligible and others are not. The institution attended does not seem a relevant way of dividing them up. It is incumbent on the Minister of State, having accepted the principle of pupil governorship, to defend the dividing line that he is seeking to draw. It is weak in the extreme, not least because of the arbitrariness of the provision that I mentioned earlier, to claim that students in further education colleges are magically and automatically wiser and more mature than those in other institutions.

When I asked the Minister of State in Committee whether he genuinely believed that, he answered with the memorable line, "I am saying what I have said."

If lines between 16-years-olds are to be drawn, the alliance wants as many young people as possible to be on the side of the angels, and thus to include those at sixth form colleges. There are overwhelming arguments in favour of statutory pupil involvement, not least that many local education authorities already include them. The Government have not produced a shred of evidence that those governors do not work well. In addition, educational evidence suggests that involvement is always a good thing.

Michael Rutter, in "15,000 Hours", wrote:

"It appears that the schools' giving of responsibility . . . plays a part in developing an overall school climate, which itself helps to shape pupil behaviour".

He also observed that children tend to live up or down to the expectations that teachers and schools have of them. That message clearly got through to the Minister of State when he spoke recently about the need to expect more of able children. Rutter continued:

"the message of confidence that the pupils can be trusted to act with maturity and responsibility is likely to encourage pupils to fulfil those expectations".

David Hargreaves of ILEA — transposed as David Hargreaves of India in the Committee Hansard—in his report, "Improving Secondary Schools", also wrote of the benefits of general involvement, saying:

"schools which involve people in their running are 'better schools' with better discipline and spirit, and in some better examination results . . . It is clear from the fifth form survey that a further cause of disaffection amongst some pupils is gradually accumulated conviction that they have no real voice in matters of school policies and decision making pertaining to the curriculum, distribution of resources, the physical environment and rules and sanctions."

I am sorry to take time on Report on something that I pointed to in Committee, but I am desperately disappointed, as the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said in Committee, that the Minister has taken some account of the argument and given us such an extraordinarily legally fallacious resolution.

11.15 pm

In France, each secondary school has a conseil d'établissement. In West Germany, schools have a schulkonferenz which has decision-making powers on discipline and daily routine. There is no questioning the fact that the schools in France and West Germany benefit from these bodies. I do not understand why the Minister is holding out from introducing this in Britain.

Thus, on the grounds of educating young people for citizenship and for participation in democracy, involving the real consumers of education and encouraging maturity among pupils, as well as avoiding the alienation which is all too common in some young people, there are excellent reasons for extending the principle, accepted by the Government in FE colleges, and applying it throughout education above the age of 16.

The recent Gillick judgment has implications for the issue of pupil governors, as it involved the concept of increasing quasi-legal responsibility for young people. In giving that judgment, Lord Scarman, sensibly observed, that the capacity of a young person to "make his or her own decision depends upon the minor having sufficient understanding and intelligence to make the decision and is not to be determined by reference to any judicially fixed age limit."

The Government, having accepted the case for pupil governors in the FE institutions, should accept them for all institutions — sixth form colleges and all. The Government's position on FE institutions is not tenable without also permitting pupil governors elsewhere. If the Government accept the wider principle of pupil governors per se, they have to accept them given the application of the most relevant criterion, which is that of age.

The alliance amendments allow the governing bodies to exclude the young people from certain matters. I totally agree with the hon. Member for Bradford, North,who also referred to this. As the chairman of a court of a university I know that it is perfectly normal to have business below the line when the press and when certain members leave the court. It does not mean that pupil governors are second class but it does mean that they are on board. The amendments recognise that there are things which it would not be proper for pupil governors to discuss, but it recognises that pupils have a legitmate place regarding other matters before a governing body.

The fact that the new governing bodies will have more matters under their remit than existing ones is not a strong reason for deliberately excluding from them the consumers of education. Pupils have a legitimate point of view and can often bring a fresh opinion to matters which concern them directly.

There is a huge difference between being an observer and speaking when one is spoken to and being a full member and having the right to bring up matters of one's own accord. Education should include learning about decision taking and representation and it is difficult to believe that the Government do not recognise their duty to do something about this in the Bill.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I wish to speak in support of the amendments which have been tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope)—amendments Nos. 5, 8, 10, 12, 15, 17, 20 and 22.

These amendments are crucial. It is disappointing in a Bill which has done so much to increase accountability to parents and choice in education that we should be considering the composition of the governing bodies in such a way as will result in the continued domination of the producer interest. The amendments would achieve a far better balance. At the moment, the number of parents governors is matched by the number of governors appointed by the local education authority.

My hon. Friend is looking at me rather quizzically, but people appointed by the local authority are the representatives of the administrators and the producer side of education. Teachers and head teachers are in the same category. Parents, even allowing for the co-opted governors, are clearly outnumbered on those governing bodies.

If one thing is common ground on this side of the House, it is that one of the biggest problems in our schools is that they have long since ceased to represent the interests of parents and their children. They have been captured by the producer interest. That is reflected in the debate. It is one of the reasons why we hear constantly about inputs into education, pupil-teacher ratios, the amount being spent on schools, the amount being spent on salaries, and teachers' duties, terms and conditions, and very little about the end product—the achievement of children.

The amendments are important. Parents should have representation and be able to make their voice heard. I know that some people will say that it is difficult to get parents interested in being governors, or that only certain types of parent will become involved.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is difficult to get some parents to become governors because of the lack of power exercised by governing boards? Does he agree that, if they had more control over finances, staffing and maintenance, more people, and people of a higher calibre, would be attracted?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend has taken the argument out of my mouth. He has obviously thought about the matter carefully. I agree with him. Even if the Bill does not go as far as my hon. Friend would like in transferring power to governors, it goes a great deal further than has been possible hitherto. My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on that. It would be a pity if, at the last jump, we were to lose the opportunity to strengthen the parents' role on boards and to give them the opportunity to participate with increased powers and responsibilities.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the amendments. They are important. If parent governors are always to be outnumbered by the vested interests and the professionals, it will be hard to get people of good calibre to serve on the boards.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I do not bring to the debate the experience that members of the Committee gained—I am sure that they are knowledgeable on these matters—I bring a more simple, but still relevant, approach.

I ponder occasionally on what I think is a special problem. It concerns what is happening in inner cities, especially with regard to governorships of schools. During the past few days, there have been some difficulties in a part of London where a governor was appointed to a school. The appointment has attracted adverse publicity in the press. Some people might wish to make political advantage out of that. It demonstrates, however, a major problem to which all political parties should address themselves. What is going on in schools and who are being made governors? What type of people are becoming governors as political appointments?

I have come to the view that the party hack often has very little to contribute. I am not saying that I would want boards of governors to be dominated by Tories. On the contrary, there are many people of my political persuasion who would never normally surface and become available for selection as governors. Such people should surface, especially in inner-city areas. They should make an effort to be appointed because only they, working with progressive elements in local authorities, can make important and necessary changes. We do not solve the problems of education simply by throwing money at the processes of education. We solve them by bringing new ideas into the consideration of all the issues as school governors make decisions.

I hope that Ministers, in observing the case that occurred in south London recently, will accept that excesses exist on all sides. Everything must be done to see that governors of the highest quality are appointed, as that will help to ensure that we are not faced with that type of embarrassment again.

What occurred in that case is part of a minority problem, in the main geared to the inner cities. There are great swathes of the country in which there is great competition among people who want to be school governors. In my constituency there is even competition in my party among people seeking nomination to be appointed school governors, and I am sure that the same applies to other parties and that the competition extends to parents and teachers. That occurs because people appreciate the great contribution that governors can play, particularly in local communities.

I say that because in many constituencies, particularly in rural ones, schools are the focus of community endeavour. The community spirit in some areas is centred round the educational establishment in the same way as in other communities it is centred round the local church and parish hall. That is why the Government should heed carefully the views of those who participate in the work of parish and town councils.

In an unashamedly constituency way, I draw the attention of hon. Members to correspondence that I have received from the members of governing bodies of schools in my constituency and members of parish councils. The people in question are deeply concerned about some aspects of the Bill and have asked me to intervene in the hope that the Government will realise that they are set on a dangerous course that could undermine the position of many governing bodies.

My correspondent from Papcastle parish council—Papcastle is near the town of Cockermouth, which borders the Lake District—writes under the heading:

"Minor authority representation on boards of governors — Bridekirk/Dovenby School and Fairfield School, Cockermouth."

The letter reads:

"The above matter has been the cause of concern for the Parish Council for some time. The last Instrument of Government has resulted in the Parish Council relinquishing its minor authority representation on the Board of Governors of Bridekirk/Dovenby School and has been the cause of a 'fight' with Cockermouth Town Council over a place on the Board of Governors of Fairfield School in Cockermouth. We understand that the Education Bill, which proposes to reduce the number of governors yet again, is under discussion in the House of Commons. This is of grave concern to the Parish Council and I have today written to the Secretary of State for Education giving the Parish Council's view on the matter. I should be obliged if you would consider the above points when the Bill is being discussed."

[Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours]

That cannot be described as a politically motivated letter. It represents the view of people of all political persuasions who are concerned about the effect of the Bill on the number of governors who can be appointed.

A letter from the Bridekirk Dovenby school governing body, signed by Mrs. Meredyth Bell, chairman of the school governors, states:

"We are governors of Bridekirk Dovenby Primary School, which is in your constituency, and we are a voluntary controlled school. We understand that the proposed changes in the 1986 Education Bill concern, among other things, a reduction in the number of school governors from 12 to nine."

I am sure that the Minister would have risen to correct me if the writer of that letter was wrong. She goes on:

"We are totally against this proposal, as our particular school represents four parishes, all of which were in the past guaranteed an effective voice on the governing body following the closure of their own local schools."

The Minister knows what we are talking about. We have had to rationalise primary education, and local authorities and Ministers have had to take difficult decisions. They have been fought, and we all know of the arguments to and fro, the appeals and the representations to Departments. At the end of the day local authorities have taken decisions and given undertakings, mainly about the nature of representation on boards of governors to secure continuity within particular communities.

Mrs. Bell continues:

"This promise has been totally disregarded and the proposed changes are calculated to undermine the support and influence of the rural communities involved. We would be grateful if you could let us know your own views on this subject and whether there is any chance of influencing this part of the proposed Education Bill."

Those letters were unsolicited by me and came from people without political motivation. They are putting a simple case to Parliament and saying, "Why reduce the number of school governors? Give us a chance. Let local authorities keep to the undertakings given when our schools were closed."

I hope that the Minister will reply specifically to those letters tonight. The local newspapers in Workington regard these matters as of great importance, and if his words tonight are pearls of wisdom, he will be well reported. They await what he has to say and I hope that he will address himself specifically to these great concerns which are being legitimately expressed by people in west Cumbria.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I rise to support the amendments in the names of my hon. Friends the Members for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) and for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth). I am sure that the remark of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that party hacks have little to offer governing bodies will have struck a chord throughout the House. That is probably at the root of these amendments.

We fear that the Government's proposed structure for governing bodies will allow the vested interests which are producers to predominate. We do not believe that this is the correct emphasis. Many parents are becoming upset at having to take what is on offer and dished out by the present governing bodies where the local education authority has a monopoly. The Bill does not tip the balance in favour of parents.

Schools should not be run for the benefit of teachers or local politicians. There is increasing evidence that the malign influence of politicians and, to a lesser extent, of local education authorities, is causing grave anxiety among parents and, in some cases, is an affront to them. In Haringey, for example, we hear that the council's new lesbian and gay unit is advising schools and colleges to develop courses to promote positive images of lesbians and gays, and to submit proposals by the end of this month. That type of development is thoroughly objected to by parents, but they have little choice because they do not have a controlling interest on the governing body. In a school in my constituency parents have even been dissuaded by the headmaster from having a parent-teacher association. That is the wrong approach and would be rejected throughout the House.

Many people tend to forget that education is not free. Parents may not pay directly by cheque to their local education authority, but they pay for it. I believe that parents are in a position to know what is best for their children, and that education is too important to be left to educationists.

Further evidence that the education system is not working and that all is not well, with grave concern that schools are not performing under the present system, comes from a MORI poll to be published next week. It was commissioned by the Audit Commission, which audits value-for-money in local services. Only 31 per cent. of those interviewed were happy with the standards of secondary education. That demonstrates that there is dissatisfaction, and that so long as we operate a system in which the consumers — the parents — are not given a major say we shall not begin to tackle the problems in our schools. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to accept the amendments moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Itchen, for in this way we shall be able to give parents more power, and they will be able to take tougher action, to produce better schools.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I should like to say a few words, particularly in support of the remarks made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) and also the speech of the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler).

In this House, we frequently enact good laws and, I suspect, frequently bad or muddled laws, but since the European Court of Human Rights started to exert its influence on the laws of this country, as we saw earlier this evening, we have from time to time enacted laws that are plain wrong.

I have a specific question for the Minister of State tonight, which I hope he will deal with in due course. Is the Minister of State satisfied — are the Government satisfied — that the proposals in relation to pupil governors in further education colleges as compared with the lack of pupil governors in schools will pass muster if it is challenged in the European Court of Human Rights?

The proposals lack logic. If a 16-year-old at a further education college is good enough to be a governor of that college and take a minority role in the decisions affecting that college, at least so far as they concern interests that can be legitimately dealt with by pupil governors, why on earth cannot pupils in sixth forms of high schools be governors of those schools?

Indeed, it could be argued that high school sixth form pupils over the age of 16 play a far more significant role in the management of their schools than their counterparts in further education colleges. One could go further and say that we know of many cases in which pupils of 16 to 18 have gone to further education colleges because they have failed examinations and were unable to stay on in the sixth form of their schools, whereas their colleagues, who have passed examinations, are able to stay at school; yet the latter are to be deprived of the right to be governors of those schools. That is manifestly absurd and illogical.

I hope that the legal point has been carefully considered by the Government and I look forward to the Minister's assurance that it has been. Let us assume, as is likely, that a case is taken through the courts of this country on behalf of a pupil who wishes to be a governor of his or her school, and thereafter to the European Court of Human Rights. Will that court uphold the decision that the Government appear to be determined upon tonight? If not, we shall face yet another of those decisions one example of which led to the Interception of Communications Act 1985 on telephone tapping; another related to corporal punishment, which has been debated tonight.

It would do the Government and the people of this country little service if this legal problem — this is a serious question that I am putting to the Minister — were brushed aside in the hope that it will go away.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is an important group of new clauses and amendments that is directed to the composition of governing bodies. Its aim principally is to alter the key provisions in clause 3, either by substituting a new formula for the composition of governing bodies or by modifying the Bill's present proposals. I think that all of us who had the enjoyable experience of sitting through the Committee could be forgiven for a sense of déjà vu in considering the new clauses and amendments, because we gave most of the issues a pretty heavy bashing in Committee. It is always pleasant, however, to take a second tour.

I hope that the speech of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) will receive the coverage in the Workington Bugle which it undoubtedly deserves. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of governors and the contribution which they have to make. I agree wholeheartedly with him that there is no place for party hacks on school governing bodies. The effect of the Bill's provisions on the south London school to which he referred would be to reduce political nominees from about 12 to three. This should encourage local education authorities to be a good deal more discriminating in whom they appoint.

The hon. Member for Workington spoke of two particular instances, and he has correspondence on them. I shall, of course, consider these cases. The Bill preserves the minimum position that was established by the 1980 Act. I suggest that minor authority representatives, valuable though they are, no longer have to represent the community given the increased parental representation. Nevertheless, we shall address ourselves to the two instances to which the hon. Gentleman referred if he will allow us to do so.

Our aim in the Bill, as we said on a number of occasions in Committee, is to create vigorous governing bodies that will be the focus for that individuality and sense of purpose that are the invariable hallmarks of a successful school. As an integral part of this aim, we want governing bodies to be the means of encouraging and harnessing greater parental influence and involvement in the way that their children's schools develop as part of local provision. That point was addressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). I shall respond later to his other remarks.

Consequently, we see it as essential that each governing body should, as necessary, be able to speak for the school and the wider community it serves with a voice that is separate and distinct from — though obviously informed by — the professionals in the maintaining LEA on the one hand and the staff in the school on the other. At the same time, we need to ensure that governing bodies are reasonably compact so that they can discharge their important functions effectively. If size were no object, there might well be other categories of person who might usefully be represented. But we want and need effective bodies and not mere talking shops.

The outcome of all these considerations is the carefully balanced formulae in clauses 3 and 7. Tailored to the size of school, these remove the scope for LEAs to appoint the majority of governors. They strengthen the parental voice and retain the representation of other key interests guaranteed by the 1980 Act. This is not as rigid as the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) was suggesting, but that is a point which is often wilfully misrepresented. The Bill allows a substantial degree of flexibility through the category of co-opted governors. But that flexibility is in the hands of the governing body itself. It is not to be imposed by the LEA in making the school's instrument of government. We shall trust the governors to decide what additional expertise they wish to add.

As I have said, our main aim is to set up governing bodies that are separate and distinct from LEAs on the one hand and teachers on the other. The local partnership which makes for successful schools exists principally not in the governing body itself but in the interaction of the governing body, the head teacher and the LEA, all within the framework of functions proposed in part III. I must emphasise that these functions have been carefully designed to complement the composition proposals in part II. They would probably have to look different if the composition were significantly changes.

The partnership to which I have referred cannot work effectively if the governing body is, as one of the partners, dominated by the others. This is why the Bill removes the LEA's majority. Given that the LEA is at arm's length from the school it seemed right to give it a share of governorships equal to that for elected parents. By the very nature of their work, however, teachers are intimately involved in the day-to-day life of the school. While their voice should clearly be heard on the governing body, our judgment is that more than the provision proposed — which continues the representation guaranteed for the first time under our 1980 Act — would give them a disproportionate influence in the overall local partnership. That is in no way to denigrate teachers whose expertise is obviously crucial to the success of schools. Indeed, it is worth pointing out that, as governing bodies will be generally smaller under this Bill than previously, the teachers' voice will be proportionately stronger.

The plain fact is that the Opposition amendments generally demonstrate a fundamental disagreement between their movers and the Government over our reasoning and the conclusions that I have just outlined. I have heard nothing that has even begun to persuade me that the Government's very carefully considered conclusions in this key area are wrong. Indeed, I am more than over convinced of their soundness as a means of re-invigorating our schools. I point out again in passing—not hoping to bring Opposition Members to their feet—that the Opposition are on the one hand obsessed with increasing the involvement of this or that group on the governing body and, on the other hand, move amendments at the drop of a hat to limit the powers of governing bodies.

Amendments Nos. 5, 10, 15, 20, 8, 12, 17 and 22 were moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) and referred to by my hon. Friends the Members for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). The amendments aim to strengthen parental representation. The Government have been persuaded—and now firmly believe—that an equal balance of places between the LEA and the parents is the right way to make progress. That was not our original view. When the Green Paper was discussed, long before I had anything to do with these weighty matters, the Government came to another conclusion. However, after taking account of the representations from parents and bodies representing parents we came to the conclusion that equal weight should be given to parents and LEAs.

The provisions of clauses 28 and 29 will also strengthen the accountability of the governing body to the parent body as a whole through the annual report and parents' meeting. We could not accept the proposed reduction in the number of teacher governors.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and his colleagues for giving weight to the representations received from parents. Many of us would be interested to know what finally persuaded him to come down in favour of a balance between the LEA and the parents, rather than a predominance of parents.

Mr. Chris Patten: I wish that I could answer that question as directly as my hon. Friend has asked it. The decision — the correct decision, I believe — to favour equal weighting was taken by my right hon. and hon. Friends when they drafted the White Paper "Better Schools". In that respect, the Bill faithfully reflects the views expressed in "Better Schools". As I said several times in Committee, I think that we have struck the right balance in the composition of the governing body and—as could not be said of the amendments moved regularly by the Opposition—between the composition and the functions of the new governing bodies.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for, albeit reluctantly, giving way. I had rather hoped that he would have had the courtesy to answer a specific question which I put to him. He has not and so I shall put it again. Has the hon. Gentleman taken and received advice on whether what is proposed will satisfy the requirements of the European Convention, and, if so, on what grounds will it do so?

Mr. Patten: I knew that I should not have given way to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I shall come to precisely that point in the course of my remarks after I have referred to the amendments moved by his ever-courteous hon. Friend, the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud).

New clauses 11 and 26 and amendments Nos. 26, 27, 31, 32, 60, 13, 18 and 23 seek to involve pupils more in school government either as observers or as governors proper. The Government fully accept — again, we had these debates in Committee — that it is desirable for senior pupils to be involved in some way in the work of the governing body. We have agreed to include guidance on this in the post-Act circular. This could well be done through observerships but there are other ways of achieving this, perhaps through separate meetings with selected groups, which would avoid observers having to keep bobbing in and out depending on the item under discussion.

However, I can see nothing in new clause 11 which would actually enable a governing body to require such observers to leave during particular items of business. Generally, it would be wrong to compel governing bodies to admit pupils or, indeed, any other observers to their meetings, though I repeat the undertaking to advise governing bodies that they should explore ways, and observerships will be one of them, of involving senior pupils and other persons as they think fit in their work.

I listened with considerable interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) developing his arguments on that point. I realise that he will be disappointed by the fact that my reply this evening is exactly the same as my reply on several occasions in Committee and I am sorry that we disagree on that point. To repeat myself, there is a strong case against second class governors coming in and out of meetings according to what is on the agenda. However, I repeat what I have said about the guidance that we shall be giving to local education authorities and governing bodies about the relationship with pupils.

Amendment No. 59 to clause 15 would allow persons aged 16 and over to be governors in any category. In this clause and in clause 56, to which I shall come shortly, we are not resting on our long-held opinion that a school or college governor holds an office of public or pecuniary trust. Such an office maynot be held by a minor. We accept that there are contrary legal opinions; that is why we have taken the opportunity to put the matter beyond doubt. I see no case for allowing LEAs to appoint 16-year-olds, as has happened, as their representatives on school governing bodies. It may be argued that 18 is an arbitrary age, but it has good legal precedents, I must remind the House again that we are giving school governors new and enhanced powers. School governorship will not be a soft option.

I therefore ask the House to reject amendment No. 59 and, for the same reason, amendment No. 180 which seeks to delete clause 56 on the minimum age for governors in further education. Given the different nature, structure and traditions of institutional government in further education and the more adult environment of that sector, however, the Government have been persuaded to make an exception to the rule in clause 56 in the case of a governor who is a student of the college concerned. This concession must, however, be safeguarded.

There are matters, such as the appointment, promotion and discipline of staff where it would not be appropriate for a student to be involved. Amendments Nos. 181 and 182, which honour our Committee stage undertaking, therefore provide for regulations to specify the circumstances and the degree in which the participation of student governors at meetings should be limited. The notion of "reserved business" in further education is not new. Many instruments already contain provisions which will meet the new regulations' requirements.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) raised a particular point, which he came back to in an intervention, about the impact of the European Convention on Human Rights. We were not remotely aware that any problem such as he suggested existed. I should be interested to know which specific provision of the convention he had in mind and any point that he cares to bring to our attention we shall look into. However, I do not think that there is a problem such as he identified.

In conclusion, I commend Government amendments Nos. 181 and 182 to clause 56. However, I must ask the House to reject the other amendments in this group in favour of retaining the carefully constructed composition provisions of the Bill.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: It is not surprising that the Government have not changed their view. We heard the same disappointing answers in Committee. I hope that when the Minister and the Secretary of State go to the Tory party conference and announce proudly that they facilitated the ending of corporal punishment in schools and get a standing ovation for that, they will recognise that although the traditional Tory party conference gesture of allowing a 16 or 17-year-old to get to the rostrum to praise the Government's record will be made, under the Bill they will deny that youngster the right to serve on a governing body. It is a sad reflection on the Government's belief in democracy that they cannot allow a 16 or 17-year-old to participate in a governing body.

I do not think that we will be able to persuade the Government to change their mind by pursuing the matter to a Division. However, I hope that the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) will consider pressing his amendment No. 13 when it comes up for consideration. Perhaps, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will allow a Division on this amendment so that the House can express a clear wish that it would like to see pupil governors appointed as observers. I do not suggest that we vote on the amendment tonight. The amendment will be much later in our consideration of the Bill, and I do not think that we will come to it later tonight. Indeed, we may not come to it until October.

The Minister might get a few messages at the party conference, one of which might be to ask him to allow the appointment of pupil governors. After the conference he might be able to rectify the position either by supporting amendment No. 13, or even by the Government tabling their own amendment to provide for pupil governors. As we would not achieve that as a result of a vote on new clause 3, I hope that I shall have the leave of the House to withdraw the motion in a moment or two, in the hope that we can have a vote on amendment No. 13 later. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 4

SCHOOL MEALS

'It shall be the duty of local education authorities:

(a) to provide, on every school day, for every pupil in county, controlled or maintained schools who want it, a mid-day meal, suitable in all respects as the main meal of the day;

(b) to provide facilities, including drinks, for pupils who choose to bring their own food.'. — [Mr. Fatchett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fatchett: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be appropriate also to discuss new clause 5 — School Library Service—

'(1) It shall be the duty of local education authorities to make adequate arrangements for a schools library service which should include:

(i) a school library in every secondary school, with adequate staffing including the appointment where appropriate of duly qualified staff and chartered librarians.

(ii) professional advice and expertise available to every school in the local education authority.

(iii) supplementary materials and central services to support school libraries.

(iv) the provision of any information as the Secretary of State may require to carry out his duties under this section (below).

(2) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to:

(i) publish guidelines for school library provision, including stands for accommodation, staffing, stock provision and maintenance, after consultation with local education authorities, the relevant teachers' unions and the Library Association;

(ii) appoint sufficient professional librarians to Her Majesty's Inspectorate to ensure adequate inspection of school libraries.

(iii) the provision of adequate finance to local authorities for the production of development plans for school libraries and school library services; and

(iv) the collection and publication of statistics of primary and secondary school libraries and school library services.'.

Mr. Fatchett: I bring some novelty to the proceedings for those who served on the Committee in that I raise a new subject. New clause 4 would extend the remit and scope of the Bill by providing a statutory framework for the provision of school meals.

There is no doubt that the school meals service has been under constant and pernicious attack from the Government. The record since 1979 is clear. The Education Act 1980 removed the compulsory requirement for local authorities to provide nutritional standards in terms of school meals. Subsequently—and, many would argue, much more damaging—there have been regular cuts in the amount of money available for the school meals service. In 1978-79, the last year of the Labour Government, £693·7 million was spent on the school meals service in real terms. By 1983-84, that had been reduced to £445 million, a reduction of about 30 per cent. The impact of these Government changes are evident in the school meals service.

Children and parents are paying more for the provision of school meals. The service is changing, and many would argue that it has changed for the worse in many respects. The number of children taking school meals has declined constantly since the Government came into office. In 1974, 64·1 per cent. of children were taking school meals. By 1984, that percentage had fallen to 51·3 per cent. There was a slight increase in 1983-84, but under this Government the general pattern has been a decline in the number of children taking school meals.

[Mr. Fatchett]

There is firm evidence about the value of school meals for all children, particularly for those who come from poorer and less well-off families. A Department of Health and Social Security report of April 1986 on the diet of British schoolchildren says:

"The free school meal is an important factor in the welfare of children from families receiving state benefits. It appeared to be at least responsible for keeping the energy intakes, particularly of older children from these families, up to the levels of the rest of the schoolchild population."

12 midnight

Further support for that view comes from the British Dietetic Association in a report called "Can I afford the diet?" It makes the point that the provision of school meals is of crucial importance for individual children.

Further support for that contention came from Sir Douglas Black. He will be remembered for his report on inequalities in health. On 14 July he wrote to The Guardian.He quoted from his report and then said:

"In our view any reduction in the provision of school meals or in eligibility for free school meals would mean putting further at risk the development of significant numbers of children . . .Nothing has changed except the accumulation of medical evidence showing that children need to be adequately nourished to achieve their potential for healthy growth and development. In view of this and the increase in public awareness and concern about the nation's health, this move"—

I shall refer to that later in relation to the Social Security Bill—

"by the Government seems the height of folly."

That is clear evidence that school meals provide a valuable service to children and to parents.

The alternative to the school meals service can be seen in very many towns and schools. Children are eating junk food or convenience food. Their diet is unbalanced. Because of the price of school meals, children are forced to eat cheaper, convenience food that has less nutritional value. This Government are responsible for the health of the children of this country. Their school meals policy will lead to a further deterioration in the health of our children, particularly those from poorer families. The Minister appears to object to that point, but had he read the Black report he would recognise that inequalities in health are related to the factors to which I have referred. I should be delighted to hear of any evidence to the contrary that he is able to produce.

There is clear objective evidence that the school meals service is valued. There is also clear evidence that, determinedly over seven years, this Government have tried to run down the school meals service.

That is not the whole picture, however. Worse is to come. Either directly or indirectly, this Government are likely further to threaten the school meals service. It is indirect, in the sense that those local authorities that have been squeezed by the public expenditure cuts are likely to follow Hereford, Worcestershire, Lincolnshire and Dorset in reducing the school meals service.

When the Minister replies to the debate, I should like him to say whether he supports the decision that will probably be taken by Buckinghamshire county council on Thursday of this week to abolish the school meals service for those who are provided with free school meals and to substitute only a sandwich service. Are this Government, who claim to be the Government of the family, prepared to support Buckinghamshire county council's decision? It would help the deliberations of the county councillors there if the Minister made clear his views, because advice from the Minister might be heeded by his Conservative colleagues in Buckinghamshire.

There is that threat, but there is also a threat from the Social Security Bill which aims to restrict the scope of free school meals. It is estimated that those provisions will affect 470,000 children. That figure was used by the Government in the debate in the other place a few days ago. That Bill shows the lack of concern that the Government have for the school meals service. It is a valued service and it has been regularly attacked for seven years by the Government. It was attacked first by reducing the element of compulsory nutritional standards, secondly by reducing the amount of money spent on the service, and now by changes in the social security provisions which will further reduce the scope of the school meals service. I hope that the Government will give greater priority to the service, that is why we have tabled new clause 4 which would impose a statutory duty on each local authority.

At least 250,000 jobs are directly related to the school meals service and many of them are in areas where alternative employment is difficult to find. Many of the jobs provide not a second income for a family, but the first and only income. The Government seem to have no regard for those jobs, for the people who provide this important service, or for their conditions of employment, because they are keen to privatise the service. I hope that the House will support the clause and impose upon local authorities the duty to provide an adequate school meals service.

New clause 5 is somewhat different. New clause 4 deals with the body in a physical sense, while new clause 5 deals with the mind, the provision of a library service. The clause seeks to place a responsibility on local authorities and on the Department of Education and Science to provide an adequate library service in our secondary schools. The Government have cut the provision of money for the purchase of books. As a result, many school libraries have suffered and many teachers find it difficult to make the necessary provision. A library is an essential part of a secondary school and plays an essential part in a child's education. We want to encourage children to read books and to use libraries to broaden their minds. I hope that we can get support for the clause. Both clauses will help the health of children, one intellectually and one physically. I am sure that a Government who talk so much about the family will have no difficulty in accepting the clauses.

Mr. Cash: I hope that it is in order to speak to new clause 5. The hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) completely failed to examine the importance of having adequate and properly qualified people — chartered librarians — to run libraries, especially in schools. That must be done under the auspices of the Library Association. I mention schools, but of course the matter goes further and includes public libraries under the Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964.

For well over 10 years I have been legal adviser to the Library Association and have been much involved in many such questions as and when they have arisen. With the new technologies that are around today, and the new opportunities that are open to people, it must be understood how important it is to have properly qualified librarians who are in a position to make an assessment, in this case on behalf of children, that will enable readers to be in receipt of well-ordered documentation, books and information.

It is often thought that libraries are about ordinary fiction, such as romantic novels, but that is far from being the case. Libraries provide the essential tools for learning and provide people, particularly children, with the means of acquiring knowledge. Therefore, it is essential to have properly qualified chartered librarians to run that service.

To believe that because they are chartered librarians there is a monopoly of work would be to misunderstand the aims and objects of the Library Association, of which Her Majesty The Queen is the patron. The association, with its code of ethics and its high professional standards, is in a position to ensure that children have at their disposal, as part of the clause says that children receive the kind of education that they should have.

"sufficient professional librarians"

in

"Her Majesty's Inspectorate to ensure"

One of the main objects of chartered bodies, which is frequently forgotten by some of them — I shall not mention them by name, but it is a matter of first importance to record the fact — is to put the public interest first, and not remuneration. I shall not go into the merits of the clause, with which I have not been associated. In the interests of children and their education, it is important to stress the role of the chartered librarian, who conducts his affairs in a proper, professional and impartial manner on behalf of the children in the school in which he serves.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I shall be brief, not just because my friendly Whip has asked me to be so, but because my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) has done such a first-class job from the Front Bench. If there is a third reason, it is that those on the Conservative Benches are becoming a little restless.

I begin by declaring my interests in this important debate—not only in the interest shared by my right hon. and hon. Friends of caring that our children have a square meal at school, but also my interest as chairman of the group of hon. Members sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees. The group has been active in ensuring that the Government recognise the need for a good schools meal service. We have been active in attempting to resist the cuts that some authorities have been proposing.

We know that soon the House will be asked to pass, in another Bill, provisions that will ensure that only children whose parents are on income support will receive free school meals, while families on family credit will receive a woefully inadequate sum for school meals per week per child. Discretionary grants will not be permitted if clause 73 of the Social Security Bill is passed into law.

Against that background, we are arguing for new clause 4. It is vital that we insert some sanity into the sorry business of the decline of our school meals service. We wish to ensure that all schoolchildren eat a nutritionally balanced meal in the middle of the day. For those who choose not to do so, our new clause states that appropriate facilities should be afforded to them to enjoy another type of meal with a drink.

I should like to believe that this is not a party political issue, but that would be naive in the extreme. However, it certainly should not be party political. Conservative Members should share our concern that the children of the parents whom they represent are fed properly. Three weeks ago the London Food Commission reported that people on low incomes were being forced to cut back on food to make ends meet. Food poverty is a growing problem as it is, without inflicting that on our very young. In 1985, despite cut-backs by certain local authorities, aided and abetted by central Government, more than 1·4 million free school meals were served each day in this country. Moreover, 680,000 such meals were served to children whose parents were on supplementary benefit, 170,000 to the children of those in receipt of family income supplement and 300,000 to those benefiting from discretionary schemes. Although pupil rolls will undoubtedly fall during the next few years, even the Department of Education and Science has estimated an overall increase in free school meals of over 100,000 between 1984-85 and 1987-88. But that will not come about if the Social Security Bill is enacted.

Those of us who support new clause 4 do so because we are aware that in our schools the junk food generation of children are already suffering nutritionally. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central has said, there is plenty of evidence to prove that. Indeed, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who is also a member of the NUPE group, would like to highlight the problems. We know that the Elephant and Castle is not a million miles away from Walworth road but it is not as yet under the control of the national executive committee of the Labour party. Yet the report of the DHSS shows that many of our children are putting themselves at real risk of heart disease and some cancers later in life by frequenting cafes and chip shops at lunch time.

However, the DHSS report got things wrong in one important respect. It is not the children who want to eat badly, but they are being forced to do so by certain Government and local authority actions. Those bodies are creating that risk for our youngsters. On 2 May, I asked the Under-Secretary of State to list 30 local authorities in England that are restricting the provision of free school meals to those whose parents are in receipt of supplementary benefit. He listed them, and all but one of them was Conservative controlled.

Conservative Members have been given fair warning that, if they vote to ensure that the junk food era continues, the Labour party, NUPE, and many other organisations—many of which are not used to political action—will join battle with the Government and with the Tory-controlled authorities and will closely monitor how Conservative Members stand on this issue.

Buckinghamshire county council is to make its decision on Thursday. I echo what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central, in that we expect the Minister to come clean when he replies to the debate. The council would be extremely foolhardy to abolish the school meals service. If the council goes ahead, 1,700 hard-working school meal ladies in that county will be sacked on Thursday. They have given loyal service to the county, and have offered to talk with the authority on how best to improve the service. However, no one has listened to them. It was noticeable that the private contractors who were called in could not improve on the service given by them. Before I came to the House, I had the pleasure to represent many of those ladies. I can honestly say that they are the hardest working people. During the short time that they provide those meals, they work in a clammy climate at a tremendous pace, and all for little pay. They deserve more than they will get on Thursday if Buckinghamshire county council goes ahead.

On top of that, the council is going ahead after Milton Keynes health authority stated that 60 per cent. of the 8,000 poorest children who reside in the county area are entitled to free school meals. The authority is opposed to Buckinghamshire county council's plan. Some 70 per cent. of the people in the county who responded to the consultative document have said that they are in favour of a school meal provision. I wonder whether the Tory party really believes that it will win Milton Keynes at the next election or any of the authorities that will be hit in that way. Tory Members are living in cloud cuckoo land if they believe that.

I hope that we can get the response that we want from the Government on new clause 4 so that we can stop the Buckinghamshires of this world from going down that road, because the children's health is at risk, and we have a duty in the House to ensure that they get a fair, square meal every day. That is incumbent on the Government, too. I shall listen attentively to the Minister's response.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), I declare an interest in the debate, as a sponsored Member from the National Union of Public Employees and a former full-time official of that union dealing to a large extent with the school meals service. As a former member of an education authority, I am well aware of the problems that education authorities have in dealing with the school meals system and trying to provide a decent school meal for all their children. I do not pretend that the clause does anything more than take us back in legal terms to the 1979 position. That would be an enormous improvement on what we now have because the past seven years have been ones of unremitting war, declared by central Government, against the principle of a school meals service, while at every opportunity, like Pontius Pilate, they wring their hands and say, "It is up to the local education authority to provide the service," and deliberately create the conditions in which it is almost impossible to provide a decent school meals service.

In putting forward the new clause, we have to say that the school meals service was created because many children from working class homes were not getting proper meals during the day——

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The hon. Gentleman has never been in a working class home.

Mr. Corbyn: They were therefore given — [Interruption.] It is easy for the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), who has two jobs — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Grantham, who seems anxious to prevent hon. Members from being heard in the debate, has two jobs and therefore has an adequate income on which he can come here and abuse his position as a Member of Parliament and try to destroy the school meals service. [Interruption.] If he has anything to say, he could stand up and say it, but he will not prevent me from speaking. [Interruption.] As much as he drones on from a sedentary position—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) must restrain himself.

Mr. Corbyn: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

As I was saying, the hon. Member for Grantham has an adequate income from his two jobs, and perhaps he could spend his time doing some of his job as the hon. Member for Grantham rather than his lucrative legal practice elsewhere. [Interruption.] I wish that some of the children who tomorrow will lose their free school meal could get hold of the hon. Gentleman and knock some sense and manners into his head. Tomorrow, those children, presumably on the vote of the hon. Member for Grantham, will lose their free school meal entitlement under the Social Security Bill. The hon. Member ought to think about what his Government and his vote will do to the school meal services.

In the past seven years, there has been, as I said before the hon. Member for Grantham started his interruptions, a process of unremitting war against the school meal service. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) pointed out, there was the removal of nutritional standards. Then there was the removal of the requirement to provide a free school meal service. Following the introduction of the grant-related expenditure assessment formulae, there was the process of rate capping. In every sense the pressure was on local authorities to increase the costs of the meal to the children, to reduce the number of staff providing that meal and thus contribute to a cycle of undernourished children and unemployed school meal workers. This clause is trying to halt that process.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde and myself have been involved with the school meal service and we are aware that the school meal workers, a large majority of whom are women, work extremely hard, in difficult circumstances and for low wages. When authorities, at the request of the women, asked that a bonus scheme should be considered, they discovered that many of those women were already working at bonus levels of performance. Such women have been eligible for a bonus scheme for many years because of the rate at which they were forced to work in some kitchens.

In the midst of all these attacks on the school meal services—the removal of nutritional standards and the removal of the legal requirement to provide a school meal service—those who work in the school meals service have sought to seek imaginative changes to the service.

In certain places, there has been a great improvement in the school meal service. Ethnic catering has been introduced and thus children of different religious backgrounds have been adequately catered for by the service. Breakfast, more salad dishes and a high fibre diet have also been introduced. Where it has been possible—with the agreement of the authority—there have been great improvements.

Reports on the Haringey school meal service and the service offered by the ILEA should be compared with those authorities which have destroyed the school meal service and which have substituted for it just a sandwich. A disgraceful thing to do.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde mentioned the decisions which will be taken tomorrow when the Social Security Bill comes back to the Floor of the House. The Committee on the Bill was lobbied by a group of school meal workers. They were patient and explained to those Committee members to whom it was possible to speak, what their job entailed, how important that service was and how they feared the loss of the principle of free school meals provided by the local education authorities.

Tomorrow, the House will have the opportunity to ensure that half a million children from the poorest households in Britain have the opportunity to have free school meal—it is important part of their diet. Tonight, we have the opportunity to reinstate the principle of the legal requirement on every local education authority to provide a school meal service. That would prevent Buckinghamshire county council voting, on Thursday morning, to abolish the free school meal service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde mentioned that there would be 1,700 jobs lost. It would also mean a large number of school children going without a meal—they would be forced to get chips and eat junk food. That would cause a cycle of nutritional deprivation which is prevalent among British children but which is not necessarily obvious among children of equivalent industrialised countries.

We are deliberately undernourishing a whole generation and we are deliberately destroying a valuable school meals service. I hope that we can agree that this clause would prevent Buckinghamshire county council from doing the unthinkable on Thursday. It would also call a halt to the completely vicious and illogical cycle under which we destroy a school meals service in order to dismiss the cooks and the catering workers and thus prevent the children from getting a school meal in the middle of the day.

We are in the middle of a ludicrous process. I hope that the House will recognise the importance and value of the service, and of the work that predominantly women school meal workers do. Hon. Members should contrast the comforts of their lives with the hardships of working-class women and children that will result from the destruction of the service. The service is a measure of society's concern for the health of children and for women workers, and it should be preserved.

12.30 am

Mr. Dunn: I must congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), who has turned into some sort of butterfly — perhaps a Red Admiral — since Standing Committee, when he was a caterpillar. I thought that his speech was rather good.

I shall deal with new clause 5 first. Such a clause is unacceptable because it would seek to pre-empt local decisions about spending and other priorities, by legislating for the school library service in a way which means that it is bound to take a larger proportion of resources. Local freedom to decide priorities for expenditure should not be fettered in that way.

As to new clause 4, I thought that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) displayed all the innocence, naivety and ignorance of a person who obviously came down with the last shower of rain. He was totally unrealistic, totally unfair and totally obtuse in his approach to the debate. I am glad that he declared his interest in the matter.

Mr. Corbyn: Have you ever been to a school kitchen?

Mr. Dunn: I have been to many school kitchens, and I dare say that I can swap blow for blow an account of deprivation, whether the urban or the rural variety, with the hon. Gentleman. I suspect that I know a lot more about deprivation than the hon. Member ever will should he live a thousand years.

The main effect of new clause 4 would be to place on local education authorities a duty to provide a meal as specified in the new clause, which no, or only a few, pupils might want on any given day. It would be unreasonable to compel local education authorities to set up and maintain the elaborate arrangements that would be needed in such circumstances. It would not be an efficient way in which to run a local authority or any other type of service. It is surely right for the local authority, which is responsible to its own local electorate, to decide, in the light of local circumstances, the right way in which to go about the lunchtime arrangements of pupils in its schools.

There are two other aspects of the new clause on which I ought to comment — first, the stipulation that provision should be made for a meal suitable in all respects as the main meal of the day. That is putting the clock back. The Government removed that requirement in 1980 under pressure from local education authorities, which told us that it was too restrictive and too centralist. As the law now stands, it is for local education authorities to decide what it is appropriate to provide. They can and do take the advice of community dieticians, health education and home economics advisers and catering managers and organisers.

Secondly, there is the curious paragraph (b), which would impose the duty to provide drinks for those who bring their own food. Local education authorities already have a duty to provide such facilities as they consider appropriate. I do not believe that it can be necessary to legislate to the effect that pupils can have a drink of water at lunchtime. I am afraid that the new clause is misconceived, and I ask the House to reject it, and new clause 5.

Mr. Fatchett: I was fascinated by the Minister's opening imagery, because while I had difficulty in understanding it in relation to myself, I had even greater difficulty in understanding it in relation to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

I shall not delay the House by dealing at length with the remarks of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who is no longer in his place. I agreed broadly with the valuable points that he made about new clause 5.

Those who read the Official Report of the debate will be disappointed to note that the Minister did not acknowledge the situation that is likely to develop in Buckinghamshire, that he did not show any concern for the 1,700 jobs that will be affected and that the did not refer to the effect of a decision on the children of Buckinghamshire. I assume that the Minister's silence on those issues meant that he would support any cuts in the school meals service.

There will also be disappointment at the fact that the Minister did not comment on some of the arguments that were adduced on convenience and junk foods, on the bearing of that on the 1980 Act and on the ending of the obligations that were placed on local authorities. I had hoped that the Minister would say whether he thought the provision of sandwiches was sufficient for youngsters, or whether more should be provided. If he believes that more should be provided, the new clause is the answer.

As the hour is late, as we have had an opportunity to raise some issues that are important to us, and as we have demonstrated that a division exists between the two sides of the House on the important issue of the school meals service, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Further consideration of the Bill adjourned.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee) to be further considered this day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 23rd July, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 4 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), the Motion in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Social Security (S.I., 1986, No. 1250) may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and a half hours after it has been entered upon, and if proceedings thereon have not been disposed of at the end of that period Mr. Speaker shall then put the Question.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Irena Ratushinskaya

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by 51 members of St. Peter's Church, Filton, in my constituency, relating to Irena Ratushinskaya, who is the subject of two early-day motions, No. 420, which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), and No. 611, in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley).

The petition relates to a poetess who is confined in a Soviet labour camp, allegedly for writing poetry. She is said to be in poor health and her husband and fellow prisoners fear that her life may be in danger.

I feel sure that hon. Members in all parts of the House will join the petitioners in asking the Foreign Secretary and other Members of the Government to make representations to the Soviet Government with the aim of obtaining the release of Mrs. Ratushinskaya and for her to receive an urgently needed medical assessment of her condition and treatment. I willingly add my support to the representations of the petitioners.

To lie upon the Table.

The British Approvals Board for Telecommunications

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

12.39 am

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I am grateful to the Minister for turning out at this late hour and for this opportunity to initiate a debate on a matter relating to high technology.

The story that I have to tell is about a small firm which has done what the Government are saying should be done but which, in the process, has been all but killed off by a Government-sponsored body. I have not chosen this particular firm because it has suffered an especial injustice or been the victim of a level of incompetence which is unusual. Unfortunately, the contrary is the case. The point of my story, which concerns Kirk Automation of Cinderford in Gloucestershire, is that it is all too chillingly typical. What Kirk Automation has suffered mirrors the experiences of many other similar high technology firms throughout Britain. Their businesses have been threatened, their employees laid off, their orders lost and their futures placed in jeopardy by the unbelievable incompetence, unacceptable delay, unreasonable expense and unimaginable bureaucracy foisted on them by the British Approvals Board for Telecommunications. The BABT is not in any way connected with British Telecom. That connection has been mistakenly made and BT has been blamed for BABT's mistakes. In this case BT is blameless.

Kirk Automation was founded by a young technologist, Kevin Kirk, in 1983. It specialises in manufacturing equipment for data communications—the very area in which the Secretary of State and the Minister have told us that Britain could and should be a world leader. It started as what is known in the trade as a legendary "garden shed" firm. Like Hewlett Packard, the giant United States hi-tech multinational, Kirk Automation started in a room so small that there was not room for both employees to work at the same time. One had to work during the day while the other came in to work in the evening.

The firm grew fast and now, less than three years after it was originally founded, employs, or employed 27 people and turns over, or did turn over before BABT got its hands on it, £500,000 a year. Last year the firm received an award for taking on more young people than any other firm of equivalent size in Gloucestershire. Turnover was predicted to double to £1 million next year. The firm has obtained orders from abroad, especially from Holland, and has significantly broken into the big market—a difficult market. The computer games giant, Atari, for example, is one of its customers.

By any definition the firm is the model of what the Prime Minister and the Government tell us a small firm should be. It is a positive fairy tale, and perhaps too much like a fairy tale, because now on cue enters stage left the wicked uncle, or, to be more precise, the bungling ogre in the shape of the BABT. The firm's mistake was to produce a piece of equipment that required BABT's approval. Last year it produced the "Magic Modem". For the benefit of the non-technically minded, a modem is a piece of equipment attached to a telephone line, enabling data to be passed through the telephone network. The Kirk Automation Magic Modem is at the centre of our story. It is a small box, that will cost about £60 in the market place, but the final bill for testing will be no less than £10,000—two and a half times the original estimate.

Like everything the firm did, its Magic Modem proved a market winner. Prestel showed immediate interest, so the firm decided to get the modem checked over by Teleproof, the commercial consultancy arm of BT, the laboratories of which are in the same place as BABT at Wharf road in London. Not only are their laboratories in the same place, but they share the same facilities, the same people, the same tests and even the same paperwork, as I shall show later.

Teleproof's engineers commented that the modem was "a beautiful piece of kit", and recommended that it should be passed to BABT for testing immediately. In November of last year Kirk Automation submitted the modem to BABT for testing, which was estimated at a quite staggering cost of £4,000. I shall leave that aside for the moment.

By December, absolutely nothing had happened. After several telephone calls, BABT said that the modem was still on the shelf, untouched, as I understand it, and that it did not have enough staff and was moving premises. Kevin Kirk, the founder of Kirk Automation, decided to investigate matters for himself and applied for a job at BABT. He was told that no one with less than a master's degree should apply. The pay was so low that no one with a master's degree would dream of applying. No wonder there was a staff shortage.

Meanwhile, orders and interest in the Magic Modem were building up. Unichem, the high street chemist chain, wanted to place a modem in all its shops up and down the country, but that could not be done until the modem had received BABT approval. Amstrad, the major and successful computer manufacturer, similarly showed considerable interest, but the modem required approval first.

In January of this year, Kirk frustrated because of the lack of progress, wrote to the local MP, the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), who has done a first-class job in chasing up the case. The firm also sent letters to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and to the Prime Minister complaining about the delay.

No doubt because of that pressure, the head of BABT, who is for some unaccountable reason an ex-Army colonel, eventually contacted the firm personally. Colonel Vivers explained that the delay was all because Kirk had not filled in the application forms correctly. That was three months after submitting the forms.

Several minor questions were sorted out over the telephone. However, the main reason for the delay was revealed to be the fact that Kirk Automation had circled rather than ticked a box on one of the forms. By the end of February, still nothing had been heard from BABT. Approaches to Kirk's MP, the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West, as well as to the Secretary of State and Oftel, seemed to have no effect on Colonel Vivers and his staff.

That is not to say that BABT was not doing anything — quite the contrary. It was busy sending Kirk Automation demands for more money. The final bill for its approval turned out to be £10,000, against its original estimate of £4,000. When one looks at BABT's charges, one can understand why that happened. Every time the small front plate, which the Minister might like to notice here, was changed so that the logo could be changed, BABT charged £750 for the testing.

BABT found one single fault with the modem, in a cable clamp, which had to be replaced and re-tested according to British Standard 415. BS 415 specifies that that must take one minute and 20 seconds. BABT's charges for that one minute and 20 seconds-worth of testing were a staggering £185, which equates with an hourly rate of £8,325. That is what BABT thinks it appropriate to charge.

I digress from the main line of the story. By April, there was still nothing from BABT. At this stage, Kirk Automation ran out of money and was on the verge of bankruptcy. The firm was saved only by the faith of a friendly bank manager in what it could and might do. Barclays came to the rescue.

The result of the delays was severe. The firm had to lay off progressively 23 of its 27 employees, including the general manager. The firm was reduced to the three-man complement of the garden shed days three years previously. Kirk Automation contacted BABT every day, but always in vain.

In mid-April there was a rumour that Colonel Vivers might be leaving BABT, but that proved to be false. At last, at the end of April, Kirk Automation received interim approval for the modem, five months after it was submitted for testing.

That is not the end of the story, because interim approval means that the company can produce only a limited number of units. However, it was able to re-engage some staff, who duly worked flat out on massive overtime to save the firm and catch up on undelivered orders.

Kirk Automation has still not received final approval for its modem. It is still in BABT's laboratory at Wharf road, in an office next door to where it received a glowing report from a Teleproof engineer nine month ago. The tests that are being carried out are the same as those which took place nine months ago. The people carrying out the tests are the same as those who were undertaking the tests nine months ago. The laboratories are the same and even the paperwork, with one small exception, is exactly the same as that which was involved nine months ago. Yet nine months have passed and Kirk Automation is £10,000 the poorer. Its orders have been lost and its staff laid off. Its viability has been undermined. As a result of its inability to meet orders, I am told that the company is being sued or pursued by suppliers and customers alike.

I do not accuse BABT of trying deliberately to destroy this small high technology firm and its products. I have no doubt that it has done so by accident, but it could not have done so more efficiently if it had planned and designed this precise outcome.

Unhappily, this is not an isolated incident. Mr. Terry Bartram of the Telecom Dealers Association tells me that the problem is widespread. It appears that there is massive and broadly felt dissatisfaction in BABT and in the industry it serves. Even if all goes well, it appears that it takes six months to get approval for the most simple piece of telecommunications equipment. By the Telecom Dealers Association's calculations, at least 50 per cent. of this time is spent in administration.

Unfortunately, there is more. BABT now seems to be delaying, if not actually refusing, approval of subscriber call forwarding equipment, otherwise known as the call diverter. When approved, this equipment will be in direct competition with British Telecom's exchange based call forwarding equipment, for which BT is able, as a current monopoly supplier of the service, to charge an exorbitant rental and secure a substantial income. I am advised that one can purchase a non-BT manufactured diverter from a well-known telecommunications equipment supplier for half the price of BT's annual rental charge. That is the annual rental charge. The public might justifiably ask why this equipment is not being approved. Who is pressing whom and for what reason?

I understand that Oftel has now accumulated a mounting pile of complaints about BABT, its delays, its overcharging and its inefficiencies. Things have become so bad that manufacturers are now deciding to make their new equipment outside Britain. For instance, Kirk Automation has received an order from Atari for one of its new designs, but Atari has insisted that this piece of equipment is built offshore, out of Britain, to avoid BABT's clammy hands.

Things are different abroad. The French Government have supplied 100 per cent. support for their telecommunications industry and are practically giving away free models to all telecom subscribers. A PABX exchange, which would cost £12,000 and take six weeks to receive approval in Germany, costs no less than a quarter of a million pounds and can take 18 months to obtain BABT approval in Britain. How can British industry hope to compete in this situation?

I should be grateful if the Minister would address himself specifically to the following questions. To whom, ultimately, is BABT responsible? Should it not be made responsible ultimately to a body such as Oftel? When will the Birtwistle report be published? Incidentally, Birtwistle is the name of yet another ex-Army colonel. I am not quite sure why ex-Army colonels seem to hold such important positions in our telecommunications industry, but no doubt there is a reason for that. Colonel Birtwistle has now been writing his report for nine months; surely it must now be nearing completion.

Most important of all, will the Minister understand the scale of the problem with BABT? Does he recognise that the cause is inadequacy and incompetence within BABT itself? Does he understand the damage that is being done to small high technology firms in an area where Britain still has some strength and where the Government say, quite rightly, that we can become a world leader? If the Minister understands all that, and I hope he does, what on earth does he intend to do about it?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I thank the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) for raising this subject today. I entirely agree that unreasonable barriers should not be placed before small companies that wish to bring new products into a growth market in which there are opportunities not just domestically but internationally for British companies in high added value, high technology engineering.

I shall try to answer the three questions posed by the hon. Gentleman about the Birtwistle report, the route through which the British Approvals Board for Telecommunications should report and the rate of progress that BABT has been able to achieve over the past three years or so.

Perhaps, however, it is helpful to begin by recapping why we have an approvals system, and why it is operated as it is. Telecommunications equipment is different from almost any other set of products in that it interfaces and interacts with a public communications network, sending electrical signals across the carrier's infrastructure and receiving signals from other attachments. This raises issues concerning the safety of the equipment, not just for users but also for network operators and employees. Moreover, characteristics of particular attachments affect the performance of the network, not just for users of that attachment and those whom they are calling, but potentially also for all other users of the network. For that reason, all telecommunications administrations require that equipment to be attached to their networks meets minimum standards of safety and performance, most commonly through a type-approval scheme.

Until 1981, responsibility for equipment approval lay solely with British Telecom, which had the network monopoly. With the introduction of competition in network operation and equipment supply, it became desirable and necessary to establish an independent mechanism for setting standards for attachment equipment and adjudicating whether particular products met those standards. Hence the setting up of BABT which advises the Secretary of State, who is the formal standards and approvals authority.

The aim was to create an independent and objective system, fair and equitable to all equipment suppliers, which could ensure the integrity of public networks and the safety of users and operators. It should be appreciated that, in doing this, we were replacing well-established arrangements, which were able to operate as flexibly or indeed as arbitrarily as BT chose. One immediate feature of an objective and independent system is that it requires published and comprehensive rules and procedures, which the hon. Gentleman referred to as more bureaucracy, whilst those operating it must build up their own resources and expertise — expertise which, due to the increased demand liberalisation has helped to stimulate, is in short supply. That is the paradoxical price of opening telecommunications markets to competition. The reward is more fairness, more openness and easier access to the market for new suppliers.

In the early days of liberalisation, everyone involved was engaged on finding a way forward, both approvals applicants and regulators alike. Delays occurred whilst they familiarised themselves with the requirements. There was a learning curve to go through. The increased output of approvals shows the results of this. However, greater familiarity with the market opportunities liberalisation is bringing has itself brought new companies with new products into the market. They too, like their predecessors, are having to go through a learning process whilst BABT is dealing with more and more applications. No one denies the need for a type approvals regime. Suppliers remind us that many overseas telecommunications administrations place great store on products having been approved in the United Kingdom. Our aim in the approvals process is to protect this reputation and at the same time ensure that United Kingdom customers have the choice of the latest technology while suppliers are able to introduce their new products with the minimal necessary constraints.

At this stage I can provide part of an answer to the hon. Gentleman's specific questions. He will wish to know the rate of approvals recommended by BABT. In 1983, at a very early stage, there were five. In 1984 there were 114. In 1985 there were 257. In the first and second quarters of 1986 there have been 163 approvals. The rate is growing dramatically, and we are here referring to the non-routine approvals. Those are major and significant new products coming into the market.

No one has denied the need for a type approvals regime, but the question is how that regime is operated. The hon. Gentleman has sought to place before the House the particular example of one company's experience in order to illustrate some of the problems.

The Kirk Automation Ltd. case illustrates the problems of transition, both for BABT and for companies. It is quite unfair to blame BABT for all the time taken, or for all the costs entailed. The hon. Gentleman may be aware that the procedure works as follows. On receipt of an application for type approval, BABT checks that the proper documentation has been supplied. It determines which standards are relevant and that may entail special exercises for novel products. It seeks tenders for testing from designated test houses, currently British Standards Institution and BT laboratories, and then advises applicants of the lowest bid and seeks their go-ahead and payment of the test fees. If a company has no previous BABT approvals, BABT checks its production and quality capabilities. BABT must then wait for the completed test results and verify them before advising OFTEL and thence the DTI to issue an approval.

That, of itself, takes time. More significantly, delays can and do arise which are not due to BABT. For example, forms may be completed incorrectly. With new products, there can be uncertainty whether appropriate standards exist. It takes time for test houses to respond to tender requests. It takes time for applicants to accept test houses' bids and to send their advance payment. It takes time to get products tested—test houses have been overloaded—or re-tested if some tests are failed and products need modification as quite often happens. Such non-BABT delays are most common for the smaller companies without experience of system. I note carefully what the hon. Gentleman has said about the needs of small companies in particular. Many of the delays in Kirk's case were outside BABT's control.

Delays and high costs are not acceptable, and I shall come on to actions in hand to reduce them. I shall first set things in context, and say a little about BABT. Most approvals still have no BABT involvement. Equipment for attachment to private circuits and enhancements to products originally approved by BT are still approved through BT. Since liberalisation, nearly 6,000 new approvals have been granted, 529 through BABT. But those 529 BABT-approved products are generally the more important ones, and the balance of new approvals will quickly shift towards BABT as the old pre-liberalisation products are replaced with new ones.

Overall, the system is working in a way which has helped achieve unprecedented consumer choice and greatly reduced real prices of attachments, while adequately safeguarding the public networks. Although approvals procedures in some other countries are on the face of it simpler and cheaper, in practice there are few other countries where all suppliers — not just those admitted to a PTT "club"—can have such a range of attachment products approved without bias or favour. That factor should be highlighted.

We do not underestimate the difficulties at BABT. The biggest single problem has been difficulties in recruiting professional engineering staff. Following a management review last year, BABT was given greater management autonomy. It moved to new offices, computerised its accounts, and recruited a further seven engineers to work on approvals and support functions. Those changes have helped reduce the backlog of applications to one third the level of last summer. A further improvement in the service offered should follow from the opening of additional new test facilities by Hull city telephone company and Standard Telephone Laboratories.

However, more radical changes are necessary to ensure further improvements. In particular, we need to reduce the bureaucracy of the approvals machinery, both in procedures and in responsibilities.

One problem to which the hon. Gentleman referred has been the overlapping interests of DTI and OFTEL since the Telecommunications Act 1984. Under that Act responsibility for the approval of contractors, approval of apparatus and designation of standards was placed with the Secretary of State, who could delegate that authority to the Director General for Telecommunications. In practice most day-to-day administrative responsibility for these matters, and hence "hands-on" expertise, has been with OFTEL, although formal responsibility has remained with the Secretary of State. In order to provide a clear focus for action, and eliminate duplicated responsibilities, the Secretary of State intends issuing a general authorisation under sections 20(1), 22(1) and 22(6) of the Act, delegating full responsibility to the Director General for approvals and standards matters—except in areas where international considerations override the requirements for domestic standards to be designated. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman for bringing this matter forward today because the debate has allowed the House to share that information which I have no doubt will be communicated to the appropriate parties.

This change should facilitate subsequent decisions over other improvements which are under consideration. I know that time is pressing. I can give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that I will examine the blow by blow account that he has presented. If need be, the hon. Gentleman and I can talk about these matters in detail in my office, and discuss the lessons of this particular path to approval.

There are two other areas where it is legitimate for the Government to act. The first is to simplify standards, and we are hopeful that the Birtwistle report will be produced speedily. The second area in which the Government can act is to increase the options available to applicants in the number of laboratories available to do the testing. As I said earlier, we are doubling the number of laboratories from two to four.

Those are the two areas of major bottleneck. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman will wish to discuss with me the options for further reassurance on the working of BABT which has been the import of the hon. Gentleman's remarks tonight. I hope that my remarks will satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister's remarks have been extremely helpful and they will be widely welcomed in those areas afflicted by this particular problem. I should be grateful if he would spend a little time considering the real problem, which relates to the time involved. The competitiveness of small firms has been so significantly undermined through problems related to time. As the Minister said earlier, I hope that he will press BABT to ensure that the time for approval is reduced to the level that exists in Germany and elsewhere on the continent in competitor nations.

Mr. Butcher: I am prepared to consider that point. That has exercised our attention for some time and we are anxious that we do not build non-tariff barriers against our domestic producers. We are keeping the position closely under review in relation to the interests if small firms, many of which we hope will become big firms in this growth area. The hon. Gentleman's views are echoed elsewhere and, for that reason and for the reasons that he has deployed tonight, I am prepared to become involved in discussions with him about the lessons of this story, including the question of time scale.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Private Rents

1. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to investigate the rents being charged by private landlords to unemployed tenants.

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): No, Sir.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware of evidence from Leeds and Liverpool that a considerable abuse of the fair rents system is taking place? Because the initiative lies with tenants to apply to register a fair rent, if the rent is paid through housing benefit there is no incentive for them to do so. A number of private landlords charge up to four times a fair rent and pocket a vast amount of public funds. Would it not be in the Minister's own interests to liaise with other Departments, for example, to put the initiative with the Department of Health and Social Security to register a fair rent, and to ascertain the extent of the abuse?

Mr. Patten: One or two cases of abuse have been reported to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It is a bit much to say that there is considerable evidence of abuse, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will pick his words carefully. Local authorities have the duty and the power to deal with cases of abuse where and when they exist. Local authorities should get on and do the job.

Mr. Hill: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are so many anomalies in the Rent Acts that to try to protect any minority, whether unemployed or otherwise, is almost impossible? Is it not time that we had a general review of the Rent Acts and tried to formulate a legislative document on the Rent Acts that the normal person in the street can understand?

Mr. Patten: The Rent Acts are of enormous concern to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and myself, and we are always thinking about them.

Mr. Alton: How can the Minister justify the fact that in one area of Liverpool for nine properties a landlord is collecting over £120,000 a year, at taxpayers' expense, whereas, if a fair rent were charged, he would collect only £50,000 a year? What does the Minister intend to do about that?

Mr. Patten: I know the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and obviously I cannot discuss it in the House this afternoon. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing it to our attention. I know of his concern about the matter. None the less, Liverpool city council has the power and the duty to do something about it, and it should do so.

Greenfield Sites

2. Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on building on greenfield sites or a ribbon development from villages and towns in southern England.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Our policies are to encourage the fullest possible use of sites in urban areas, to protect the green belt and to avoid ribbon development. But some building on open land cannot be avoided if the demand for homes and commercial and industrial premises is to be met.

Mr. Rathbone: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the first part of his answer is reassuring, but that the second is not? Does he also accept that structure plans, as drawn by local councils, have identified, in my constituency at least, sufficient land for development for housing beyond the turn of the century? Will he encourage builders to develop that land, encourage councils and other public authorities to make that land available, and look carefully before he gives permission for development outside those village and town boundaries?

Mr. Ridley: Yes I certainly will, but I am not the planning authority. In the first instance, the district council is able to grant planning permission, and it can do so, on some occasions, with regard to open land. My policy on appeal is as I have described it.

Mr. Steen: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is sheer madness to build on greenfield sites outside towns and villages when almost a third of a million acres of land are vacant, dormant and derelict in public ownership? Should not the Government call in all structure plans that seek to eat into the greenfield sites, to ensure that all the vacant, dormant and derelict land in public ownership is filled up first?

Mr. Ridley: I agree with my hon. Friend that vacant and derelict land in cities and towns should be the first land to be redeveloped, but it would not be acceptable locally or right to develop a hard and fast policy. I could not agree more strongly with my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Mr. Wiggin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will, of course, always be demand for housing, but that central Government have a responsibility to ensure that the south does not finish up with concrete from Kent to Somerset? Does he agree that, in the national interest, it is important that development should be pushed further north, which everyone would welcome?

Mr. Ridley: Yes; but I make the point that I am not the only person who gives planning consent. Some 75 per cent. of consents are given by planning authorities.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not interesting that all this pressure for new housing development is in the south, not in the north? Is not the reason for the high level of demand the emphasis of the Government's economic and industrial policies on development in the south? If a switch were to take place towards the northern region of the United Kingdom, all those pressures would be relieved. That is at the heart of the problem.

Mr. Ridley: No. One of the main engines of this pressure is the high rating policies of councils in the north of England, which have driven businesses south, forcing people to follow if they are to obtain jobs. If the hon. Gentleman wants to do his constituents a service, he will encourage northern councils to impose lower rates.

Empty Houses

3. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made by the London boroughs towards bringing empty residential property back into use.

Mr. John Patten: The boroughs reduced their empty dwellings from some 34,200 in 1982 to 31,600 in 1985, but further improvements should be made as soon as possible.

Dr. Twinn: I welcome my hon. Friend's reply with the good news that there has been a reduction. Is he aware that that does not apply to every authority? There is still a need to reduce the unacceptably high numbers of flats and houses which stand empty for a long time. What are the Government's proposals to ensure that councils toe the line?

Mr. Patten: We are continuing to give as much advice and guidance as we can, especially in respect of frankly delinquent boroughs such as Southwark, which is Labour-controlled, with 5 per cent. of its stock empty, Hackney, which is Labour-controlled, with 7 per cent. of its stock empty and, worst of all, Tower Hamlets, which is Liberal-controlled, with more than 8 per cent. of its stock empty.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister agree that one of the culprits in keeping homes empty is his beloved Tory-controlled Wandsworth council? Homes there are kept empty, much to the offence of homeless and badly housed people, because Wandsworth borough council is selling off those properties.

Mr. Patten: Wandsworth is without doubt one of the best housing authorities in this country. Through prudent management of its resources, Wandsworth is managing to spend more than almost any other London borough on the repair and renovation of housing stock.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. Friend aware that nothing will assist in alleviating the shortage of residential accommodation in London so much as the repeal of the Rent Acts, which have been the cause of much social misery as well as housing shortages for many years?

Mr. Patten: Alas, there are about 90,000 vacant private properties in London. If we could find a common sense way of bringing those properties back into use, that would be of the greatest possible assistance to the homeless. I wish that we could find some common ground about ways to achieve that without involving the confiscation of private property.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Minister accept that his Department, when it last studied empty properties in the public sector, concluded that 3·8 per cent. of properties in the public sector were empty, 4·2 per cent. of properties in the private sector were empty and 6·9 per cent. of Government properties were empty? Will the hon. Gentleman put his own house in order before he criticises local authorities?

Mr. Patten: It is important for Government Departments to make sure that they are getting rid of all empty property. Certainly Government Departments, to take just one example, will be rid of all their empty houses by 1988.

Mr. Heddle: Does not my hon. Friend's answer confirm that local authorities in London and elsewhere are not necessarily the best qualified to manage the nation's housing stock? Is that not further endorsed by the fact that the majority of the nation's rent arrears, now considerably in excess of £200 million, should have been collected by otherwise negligent Labour-controlled councils? What proposals does my hon. Friend have to put out the management of the nation's housing stock to housing associations, building societies and others?

Mr. Patten: We have an appalling problem of rent and rate arrears in this country, which amounts to more than £200 million. We intend to explore every avenue that we can to reduce that debt burden. In particular, we are always prepared to consider the idea that the management of council stock should be devolved to tenants, who can probably manage it a lot better than many local authorities seem to be doing at present.

Rate Support Grant

4. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to announce details of the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement.

Mr. Ridley: I announced details of my proposals for the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement to the House yesterday.

Mr. Fisher: Is it the Secretary of State's intention to set a deliberatly inadequate level of grant-related expenditure in order to force many local authorities to spend beyond it and so incur millions of pounds worth of loss of grant? In practice, would that not be a rather devious way of reintroducing a penalty system in another form? If it did happen like that, would not much, or perhaps all, of the £1 billion that the Secretary of State talked about yesterday be offset by such loss of grants?

Mr. Ridley: It is the Government's intention, after consultation, to set grant-related expenditure totals at a lower figure than the total of provision. The consequences that will flow from that are not those suggested by the hon. Gentleman. There will be a slightly different allocation of resources in a better direction, and I doubt whether it will make much difference to the amount of grant forfeited.

Mr. Powley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, following his generous settlement of the rate support grant yesterday, there should be no excuse for any local authority to engage in extravagant and unnecessary spending? Does he also agree that the settlement should be used to keep rate demands down to their lowest possible level and that money should be spend only on that which is necessary and essential?

Mr. Ridley: The in word is "realistic" rather than "generous". However, I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I confirm that the results of yesterday's announcement should be that councils which spend reasonably and moderately in accordance with their needs will suffer little, if any, need for increasing rate bills.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Secretary of State aware that the London borough of Newham is still in dispute with his Department about the outturn of the borough's budget for 1985-86? As that obviously very much affects the calculation upon which he has based Newham's rate capping, it means that less agreement can be reached in favour of Newham. Next year the London borough of Newham, which is the second most deprived local authority area in the country, will have to make a reduction of about £20 million in its budget. Will the Secretary of State please tell the London borough of Newham, since he has taken over control of local government, where it should make the cuts in expenditure? Is he aware of the enormous social and economic problems in Newham, or does he not care? We pay.

Mr. Ridley: I have the deepest sympathy with the inhabitants of the borough of Newham when I think who represents them at local government and parliamentary level. So great is it that if they were to come to me with an application for redetermination of their expenditure level, we would consider it in accordance with the legislation.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Is the Secretary of State aware that the considered view of some of the associations of local authorities is that, having received approximately £1 billion of new money, £630 million will be lost by the abolition of recycling? Is that because the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told the Secretary of State that that will allow a half penny in the pound to come off income tax, or is it because the Secretary of State will make sure that the money lost will be put back into the kitty and the Government will not suffer a net loss, despite the announcement made yesterday?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has mixed up two different years. The figure for the current year is £628 million of lost grant, but, with a great increase in both provision and aggregate Exchequer grant next year, the figure of grant lost must, by definition, be much smaller than that. If authorities do not spend up at all, it will be zero. It is up to them.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I recognise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was unable to rate-cap Leicester, because, as he said in his statement yesterday, there was something wrong with the formula. However, I reassure him that the people of Leicester are sad that they have not been re-rate capped. Will he look at the formula again and possibly include Leicester later, because the council is borrowing money unfairly? Rates are shooting up by the 80 per cent. I mentioned yesterday, and the people of Leicester feel let down.

Mr. Ridley: The people of Leicester have one consolation for the unfortunate nature of their local authority, and that is that they are extremely well represented in Parliament.

Mr. Straw: I sympathise with the Secretary of State's problems in relation to Leicester, and particularly the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), but is he aware that his statement, that the amount of holdback under the system is bound to be less than the £628 million last year, shows how little he understands the system over which he presides? The amount of holdback could be more than £628 million for this year if he sets the levels of GREA substantially below the £25·2 billion at which he has set current expenditure. Will he come clean and tell the House at what level he will set the GREA?

Mr. Ridley: I made it clear that the Government thought that an increase in the totals of GREAs by the amount of the GDP deflator would be appropriate, although we have increased the total provision by 8·5 per cent. The figures are 3·5 per cent. on GREAs and 5 per cent. extra provision above that, which means an increase of 3·75 per cent. over this year's budgets. If authorities have provision to spend at 3·75 per cent. over this year's budget, not this year's provision, they are able to survive without forfeit of grant. The cash figure for GREA is 95 per cent. of the cash figure for provision.

Rate Capping

5. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to seek further powers to prevent local authorities taking action aimed at circumventing rate-capping legislation; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): My right hon. Friend announced yesterday that he would be seeking to block one major loophole which has up to now been used by some authorities to avoid the effect of rate capping. We keep the position under review.

Mr. Hayes: I hope that my hon. Friend will take careful note that the Left-wing loonies who run Harlow council recently banned the playing of the national anthem. The council has arranged a loan facility with a merchant bank for £50 million, which will cost the ratepayers over £20 million in bank charges. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to do something about it.

Mr. Waldegrave: Harlow is one of the authorities which, by manoeuvreing their balances, have just kept out of rate capping by keeping below the threshold of £11 million. The only thing that one can say to such authorities is that the penalties for all this will be visited on the people in the end. They will be paying not only the cost of the Left-wing high expenditure, but the profit margins of the people who are enabling them to undertake these manoeuvres.

Mr. Cartwright: Rate capping has not prevented the London borough of Greenwich from budgeting to spend 25 per cent. more this year than it spent last year, so is the Minister not shutting the stable door long after the horse has well and truly bolted? Will he confirm that whatever fancy borrowing the council is undertaking, there will be a day of reckoning when the bill has to be paid, not by the councillors, but by the ratepayers? What help can the ratepayers get from the measures to which the Minister has just referred?

Mr. Waldegrave: We have blocked off one of the major measures. A leader of one of the Labour-controlled London boroughs, Mrs. Hodge, has explicitly said that she believes that this is a very high risk strategy, because it rests upon being bailed out by a future Labour Government. That is indeed a very high risk strategy, particularly as the Labour Front Bench has taken great care not to say that Labour will bail them out. The costs will fall on the ratepayers in the end. It is very irresponsible of those authorities to act like that.

Mr. Squire: I welcomed yesterday's announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Does my hon. Friend not think it strange that some of the most Left-wing councils have been prepared to embrace capitalism in some of its more extreme forms, including overseas banks and offshore funds?

Mr. Waldegrave: They will also learn, as some countries in South America and elsewhere have learnt, that, although one can borrow, in the end it catches up with one.

Mr. Pavitt: In the first part of his answer to me yesterday the Secretary of State referred to rate capping in Brent. In my innocence, I thought that he understood the intense social problems in that inner city area. If he was sincere, will he now make sure that no attempt is made to prevent creative accounting or steps being taken to ease rather than circumvent rate capping, and provide some services for the very hard-pressed people in my area? Yesterday the Secretary of State referred to rent arrears, but they occurred under a Tory administration. I assure him that now that Labour has gained control again, they will be rapidly dealt with.

Mr. Waldegrave: I do not believe that the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question can be quite right, because there was only one year of Tory administration in Brent. What stands between the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend and me is a completely different analysis of what will help the people of Brent. We do not believe that high spending, high taxing inner city authorities are the best way out for problem areas like Brent. Brent needs enterprise, low taxes and new jobs.

Mr. Stern: Has my hon. Friend noted the recent decision of Bristol city council, which is under Labour control, to seek funds from an overseas bank for wasteful expenditure, which funds will no doubt arise from that bank's investments in South Africa? Does he agree that this is just a sign of the new-found desire of Bristol city council, at the prodding of the Transport and General Workers Union, to increase trade links with South Africa?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is very ingenious in going a little bit wider than my Department's responsibilities. I am aware that Bristol city council has been seeking the re-financing of some of its dock debt, but I am not certain that I am aware of what my hon. Friend is referring to today.

Mr. Straw: Will the Minister confirm that the admission that we dragged out of the Secretary of State a few moments ago means that authorities' GREAs will be £1,260 million less than the £25·2 billion that he said he was accepting as their current spending? That is bound to mean that not just rate-capped authorities will suffer penalties, but that virtually every authority will suffer major penalties and that the total of those penalties could well, arithmetically, exceed the £628 million of grant money that was recycled this year.

Mr. Waldegrave: When the hon. Gentleman has done the sums more carefully, I think he will find that it is exceedingly unlikely that the grant penalty money will be comparable to that for this year. Neither he nor I can say yet what the likelihood will be, because it will depend upon the spending levels and upon the GREs that are ultimately set.

Fire Resistance Tests

6. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to comply with European Economic Community draft directive 1202 on fire resistance tests.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): Commission document 1202 contained simply a preliminary draft directive. Since then work has been undertaken by the Commission to develop the proposals further. We shall be consulting industry when a formal proposal is made as a further step in the Community's programme for removing barriers to trade.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister will know that the Government's publicly stated objective, while they hold the presidency of the EEC, is to remove technical barriers to trade. As the Minister rightly says, draft directive 1202 does that by absolving manufacturers and exporters from having a second fire test. We all understand why the fire laboratories, which make a fat living from this testing, should want to drag their feet, but why are the Minister and the Government dragging their feet?

Sir George Young: Neither the Minister nor the Government are dragging their feet. The high standards in Britain are maintained through the building regulations. We are waiting for the Commission to follow up its draft directive with firm proposals, and the moment that it does that we shall respond.

Multiple Occupation Houses

7. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take in the light of the findings of the first part of his Department's research study of houses in multiple occupation in England and Wales; and when he hopes to publish the second part of the study.

18. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about his Department's policy towards houses in multiple occupation.

Mr. John Patten: We have already strengthened local authorities' powers in this area and issued guidance. They should use those powers and follow that guidance. We are considering the need for further measures in the light of the current research and representations to the Department. We hope to publish the second part of the study before the end of the year.

Mr. Knox: As over 1 million people live in multi-occupied accommodation, and as at the present rate of progress it will take between 70 and 85 years to bring it up to acceptable minimum standards, does my hon. Friend not think that there is a strong case for introducing legislation to compel local authorities to direct resources into this important but neglected area?

Mr. Patten: This is an extrememly important area and one in which my hon. Friend has shown a considerable interest for many years. Progress is patchy. Some local authorities have made good progress, but, alas, others have not used the powers that have been theirs for between 20 and 25 years. We are waiting for the results of the research examination that we are making. Those results will be published by the end of the year and at that time we shall consider whether to issue strengthened guidance, or perhaps even to introduce legislation, which is what my hon. Friend wants.

Mr. John Fraser: Does the Minister agree that such information from his Department's survey as we have received confirms all the warnings of death, danger and dereliction in houses in mulitple occupation? On his Departments' figures, one in two is in a poor state of physical repair, one in four is badly managed and one in six is overcrowded. Why wait? Why not allow the Bill that has completed its passage through the other place to pass through this House so that at the third attempt we can have some tougher legislation about houses in multiple occupation?

Mr. Patten: We should wait for the research results, which, as I have said, will be published before the end of the year. If we do that we can take decisions on the basis of properly evaluated examination. I ask the hon. Gentleman not to forget that since 1979 we have given local authorities additional powers, and in certain circumstances we have placed duties on them to use those powers. We have made it possible for grant to be paid for the installation of fire escapes. I wonder why it is that so many local authorities have not used the powers that have been available to them for a quarter of a century?

Mr. Squire: Will my hon. Friend consider making it a requirement on landlords of houses in multiple occupation to post a notice stating the relevant fire risk within the property, so that at least the tenants can be aware of the dangers they face?

Mr. Patten: That is a valuable suggestion by my hon. Friend and we shall consider it when considering the results of the research at the end of the year.

Homelessness

8. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation for homeless families.

14. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives he intends to take to solve the problems of homelessness.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on 21 July.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister accept that there is a real crisis of homelessness, especially in the London area? According to Shelter figures, which are better than his Department's, there are 4,400 homeless families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation in London. That is an increase of 16 per cent. in three months. Over a year the cost to local authorities in London has doubled from £13 million to £26 million. Keeping families with young children in bed-and-breakfast accommodation is humiliating and degrading and ought to be brought to an end immediately.

Sir George Young: The Government have made it clear that bed-and-breakfast accommodation should be used only as a last resort and for as short a period as possible until permanent accommodation is secured. This year we have increased by £200 million the provision for housing investment, and we have redistributed it in such a way as to give more benefit to those boroughs that have a homelessness problem. We have asked the boroughs to give specific priority to the homeless when they make their investment decisions. It is interesting to note that many London boroughs, such as Brent, are not taking up the offers under the Greater London mobility scheme that are available to meet the needs of those in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, there is a large amount of empty public authority housing stock in London. We are determined to bring that back into use to help the homeless.

Mr. Hamilton: Does the Minister recognise that probably the Government's greatest social crime is that since 1979 housing expenditure has been slashed by very nearly half? At this moment 400,000 building trade workers are unemployed, but hundreds of thousands of people are out searching for a house and cannot find one. It is not only me and my hon. Friends who are objecting to those obscene policies, but the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Charles, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Queen herself.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Minister answers I remind the hon. Member and the House that we never introduce the royal family to support our arguments. We stand on our own.

Sir George Young: The major reduction in public investment in housing took place under a Labour, not a Conservative Government, and the hon. Gentleman's statistics ignore the recovery in the private housebuilding sector, which meets real housing needs.

Mr. Lyell: Might not the way to bring the private rented sector back into operation be to abolish the Rent Acts and institute a limited form of control along the lines of business tenancy controls under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954?

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), the then Secretary of State for the Environment, said in June last year that we would have no major proposals for rent reform in this Parliament, but that we were interested in proposals after the next election.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my hon. Friend say to the House that the way that Labour Members, especially in the way they make references to members of the Royal Family, seek to distort the facts and mislead our nation is shameful? Is it not true that if all the council accommodation in Britain which is currently vacant because of inefficient management, mainly by Socialist local authorities, were put to use, virtually all Britain's homeless could be given a home immediately? Remarks by the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Shut up, you old windbag.

Mr. Winterton: Well, that is the pot calling the kettle black.

Is it not shameful how the hon. Gentleman will seek to use our royal family

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same rules apply on both sides of the House.

Sir George Young: Arithmetically, my hon. Friend is correct.

Mr. Janner: Is not the real problem for local authorities, not that they have a statutory duty to house the homeless, but that the number of homeless people is growing, that the amount of money available for councils to build, as they want to do, is evaporating — so that, for example, some 30,000 people in Leicester are on the housing list — and councils are then forced to spend revenue instead of capital on housing people temporarily in bed and breakfast accommodation, which is a rotten

Sir George Young: I do not have the figures for Leicester in front of me, but in London it is the case that the number of relets of council housing has gone up since 1978-79, in spite of the right to buy. So it is not the case that there is a decreasing number of local authority flats available to help the homeless. Certainly in most major cities more and more homeless people are being given priority under the Acts and are getting permanent accommodation.

Mr. Rooker: Does the Minister accept, notwithstanding the figures that he used earlier, that in the best year of the national housebuilding programme under this Government there were 50,000 fewer new dwellings than in the worst year under the Labour Government? As next year is the international year of shelter for the homeless, could not the Government take some special measures to talk about the new initiatives, which were implied in one of the questions that he refused to answer, to deal with the misallocation of money that is implied in funding bed-and-breakfast accommodation when there are a vast number of unfit empty dwellings in the public and the private sectors?

Sir George Young: One of the top priorities for any local authority with its HIP allocation should be to bring back into use the empty properties that it has, many of which have been empty for more than a year. I suspect that the figure that the hon. Gentleman gave was just for the public sector.

Mr. Rooker: No, total.

Sir George Young: There has been a recovery in private sector starts. The figures are at the highest level for 10 years, apart from one year. Local authorities of all persuasions are rightly using their allocations to modernise and to bring up to standard properties that they already own rather than embarking on programmes of new build.

Environmental Services

9. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received seeking additional resources for authorities to enable them to increase expenditure on environmental services.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): The local authority associations through the Consultative Council for Local Government Finance are consulted about local authority relevant expenditure, including that on local environmental services.

I also receive representations from individual authorities.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister not accept that some areas need more resources in order to make swifter environmental improvements to compensate for rapid economic decline? Is she aware that the Minister responsible for sport recently visited South Yorkshire and is reported as having realised that the position is grave? Indeed, I believe that he used the word tragic. If his visit does not lead to increased support for my area, may we command the attention of the organ grinder rather than of the monkey?

Mrs. Rumbold: In 1986-87 the hon. Gentleman's local authority is receiving some £400,000 in derelict land grant compared with the sum of only £300,000 that it received collectively for the previous three years. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a very realistic settlement yesterday. Consequently, it is to be hoped that the hon. Gentleman's local authority will be able to find adequate provision for local environmental services.

Sir Dudley Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that some of the money could well be used by local authorities to preserve the integrity of the green belt, which is constantly under attack? Is she aware that the green belt is particularly vulnerable when big and desirable projects such as motorways are put forward for development on the fringes, where people are trying to convert the green belt into extra work?

Mrs. Rumbold: It is to be hoped that local planning authorities take great care not to infringe the green belt unless there is general consent for that among the local population.

Dr. David Clark: Does the Minister not realise that her assurances fly in the face of reality? Will she confirm that the number of those employed in the key environmental agencies — the Countryside Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council, the Countryside Commission for Scotland, the Forestry Commission, and the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas has fallen by more than 2,000 during the seven years in which the Government have been in office?

Mrs. Rumbold: All those organisations have managed to increase their services and to improve on their excellence in discussion and consultation with central Government. Staffing numbers are adequate, according to their own lights.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Is my hon. Friend aware that there has been a suspension of European regional development fund non-quota grants to local enterprise boards which wish to carry out environmental improvements in, for example, Lancaster? Will she affirm that such boards are eligible for grants from the ERDF, and expedite them?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend knows that ERDF funds have to be matched by funds from the local authority. I note what my hon. Friend says, and will take it into account.

Beaches (Pollution)

10. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he proposes to take to guarantee the safety from coastal pollution of bathers on beaches at holiday resorts in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave: In the next five years it is expected that some 80 schemes to improve the quality of coastal waters, costing over £300 million, will be in progress and completed throughout the United Kingdom. This is roughly double the rate of expenditure of the last four years.

Mr. Kirkwood: That is a helpful answer. However, does the Minister agree that it is a matter of some concern that many of our resorts that have served the country well for years are being despoiled by raw sewage in our coastal waters? Will he comment on the reports produced by Greenpeace, whose independent analyses have shown that the level of pollution off Blackpool beach may meet Department of the Environment requirements but is five times higher than European limits? What does the Minister have to say about that?

Mr. Waldegrave: I announced last year that we were undertaking a survey of all bathing beaches. The survey will be completed next spring. The preliminary results are quite encouraging and show that up to half the beaches probably meet European directive standards. There has been a problem at Blackpool and a project has been launched, with expenditure of over £30 million to put things right.

Sir Peter Blaker: Would it not be rather more appropriate if the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) confined his remarks to the beaches in Berwickshire and did not make disparaging remarks about the finest beach in the country, which is at Blackpool? May I congratulate the Government on their plans for improving the beach at Blackpool? I ask my hon. Friend to elaborate on what he said about that, as his remarks were rather difficult to hear.

Mr. Waldegrave: I find it rather more natural to be talking about Blackpool in reply to my right hon. Friend. I hasten to say that there is nothing seriously wrong with the Blackpool beaches. There is no health hazard. As part of the improvement of Blackpool beaches, and a number of other beaches, we are bringing forward a scheme that will cost about £35 million to make further improvements. I can confirm that the already fine beaches will be even better.

Mr. Boyes: Is it not a fact that the Government have abused their powers under the Water Act 1973, with the result that in real terms capital investment has declined by 12 per cent. since 1978-79? Even worse, it was reported in the Brighton Evening Argus of 15 July that in the Southern water authority area gross pollution of many of the traditional holiday spots is the result of capital investment declining by 28 per cent. between 1980 and 1985. It is no wonder that Mrs. Hargreaves found herself swimming in neat sewage off Seaford. She said that it was absolutely disgusting—just like the Government's policy towards the water industry.

Mr. Waldegrave: Without the steady guidance of the leader of the Opposition's environment team, the hon. Member for Copeland, (Dr. Cunningham), things are getting rather out of control. Investment in the water industry is at the highest level that it has ever been. I have given figures to show that the investment in coastal water improvements is about to be doubled.

Mr. Harris: I recognise that progress is being made, but does my hon. Friend not find it incredible that raw sewage is still discharged into the sea and on to beaches, especially in parts of the south-west that are dependent on tourism? Surely this is an area that should be given top priority in any capital spending programme.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is for that very reason that considerable resources are now being committed. The programme will not be finished at the end of five years and the expending of £35 million. Further resources will be committed after that. A steady programme of improvement will ensure that by the end of the century virtually all the remaining problems will have been removed.

Strategic Planning Policies

11. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the operation of strategic planning policies in the former metropolitan county council areas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): Yes, Sir. My right hon. Friend is satisfied.

Mr. Lloyd: I regret that I shall not be able to bring Mrs. Hargreaves into this supplementary question. Is the Minister aware that in the Greater Manchester area a number of property developers are seeking to develop large shopping sites in the different boroughs? The problem is that each local authority has an incentive to ensure that it is not the last to allow such development to go ahead. As the Government have taken away the strategic planning role of the Greater Manchester council, what does the Minister intend to do to ensure that we have a co-ordinated approach to what could be a serious development problem?

Mr. Tracey: The local authorities must conform with the current local plans and, indeed, the Greater Manchester structure plan, the alterations to which were approved in January 1986. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is not our practice to discuss current cases at the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Favell: I am afraid that I know nothing about Mrs. Hargreaves, but I know that we do not need a thumping great county hall to exercise overall strategic planning control. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment can do just that. Bearing that in mind, will my hon. Friend call in the seven planning applications for out-of-town shopping centres now being applied for in the Greater Manchester area, one of which is for over 1 million sq ft? At a time when we are trying to regenerate the inner cities, would it not be foolhardy to put our town centre shopping areas in jeopardy, and all the jobs that go with them?

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will look at all material considerations before calling in any planning applications, but I repeat that we cannot discuss current planning applications at the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Skinner: Is Mrs. Hargreaves involved in these strategic planning policies? Is she a floating voter, and who will get her out of it?

Mr. Tracey: I fear that that has nothing to do with planning.

Local Government Finance

12. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the impact of the Local Government Act 1986 on the activities of local councils, with particular reference to political publicity and information campaigns.

Mr. Ridley: No formal procedures have been instituted to monitor the effects of the 1986 Act, but I am watching its operation carefully.

Mr. Amess: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Basildon district council continues to flout the law by spending ratepayers' money on propaganda to bolster Labour councillors' chances in marginal seats and by telling the editor of Link magazine not to photograph local Conservative Members of Parliament or report their presence at any event? Does my right hon. Friend agree that such bias is quite wrong?

Mr. Ridley: I entirely agree that such bias as my hon. Friend alleges is quite wrong, but I encourage him to use the remedies of the civil law, which are there to interpret the 1986 Act. Even if we strengthen those powers it will still be a civil law requirement to enforce them. That is where my hon. Friend's remedies should properly lie.

County Structure Plans

13. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will describe the administrative process by which he negotiates with county councils on their structure plans.

Mr. Ridley: County councils must submit to me for my approval their proposals for alteration or replacement of their structure plans. Normally an examination in public is held, at which the council can explain its proposals. I may then publish draft modifications for comment before the plan is approved.

Mr. Adley: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer and, indeed, for answering the question itself. Will he confirm that the initiation of structure plans and, indeed, the initiation of the revision of structure plans, is primarily the responsibility of the county council, and not his Department? Will my right hon. Friend further confirm that his Department responds after the county council has produced its proposals, and does not pressurise county councils before they produce their proposals? Finally, will he confirm that Dorset county council's revised structure plan for south-east Dorset is entirely its own responsibility?

Mr. Ridley: I can confirm that all that my hon. Friend has said is correct.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he will not seek to impose higher levels of development upon county councils presenting such structure plans? Does he recognise that in counties such as Dorset, whose present structure plans, development, and population levels have already been substantially exceeded, any suggestion that new structure plan proposals, levels of development or population should be exceeded would be greeted with great dismay and would be contrary to the wishes of the residents of such places?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend will not expect me to comment on any specific county plan or on any planning application. The description of the system which I outlined to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) is accurate and the policy on the green belt is well known. It is difficult to discuss any general concept of planning without reference to the particular. However, I note what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. John Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is deep concern among the people of Hampshire, including Winchester, and possibly a certain Mrs. Hargreaves, about the fact that his Department has decided to impose an increase of 65,000 additional houses on the south Hampshire structure plan, which is greatly in excess of the infrastructure available and which is drawing much-needed resources from city centres in the south and north of England? Will he please assure the House and the people of Hampshire that he will look into this matter and ensure that the locally and democratically expressed views of the people of Hampshire about housing are adhered to?

Mr. Ridley: I note what my hon. Friend has said. However, it appears that Mrs. Hargreaves comes from the north, and I am sure that my hon. Friend would not be grudging about affording her a house if she were to arrive in his constituency.

London Residuary Body

15. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what matters were discussed at the meeting with the chairman of the London Residuary Body on 19 May 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: Matters relevant to the residuary body's functions under the Local Government Act 1985 were discussed.

Mr. Banks: Does the Minister recall the answer that she gave to me on 11 July regarding the timing of distribution of balances from the London Residuary Body to the London boroughs? She said:

"The timing . . . is a matter for the"—— [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] At least I can read. It appears that an awful lot of liquid lunches have been consumed by Conservative Members. The Minister said:

"The timing of the distribution is a matter for the LRB."—[Official Report, 11 July 1986; Vol. 101, c. 310.]

However, it is equally clear from the meeting that the Secretary of State had with the chairman of the London Residuary Body on 19 May—which was duly recorded—that the Government have been directing the London Residuary Body about the timing of the distribution of those balances. That is not unconnected with the local council elections on 8 May. Would the Minister now care to recorrect her position and stop misleading the House?

Mrs. Rumbold: The chairman of the London Residuary Body came to see the former Secretary of State on 19 May about an announcement that he was to make on the balances, which he subsequently made on 20 May following his discussions with the then Secretary of State. In relation to the further balances, following the Law Lords' decision striking down the GLC's last-minute forward funding package, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the LRB has the power to distribute balances to the boroughs and to decide the timing as and when it pleases.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Is my hon. Friend aware that, despite our local representations, the residuary body has placed Hainault Forest under the control of three different authorities? Is she further aware that this is bad management and is making it more difficult to deal with the problem of the gipsy intrusion? Will my hon. Friend consider this problem?

Mrs. Rumbold: As my hon. Friend is aware, this is a matter for the London Residuary Body. I shall, however, consider the matter.

Mr. Straw: When the chairman of the London Residuary Body next meets the Secretary of State and asks why he and the House were tricked by the Secretary of State yesterday about the total of the rate support grant settlement, what answer will he receive? Specifically, what answer will he receive when he asks why the Secretary of State yesterday deliberately withheld from the House information that the level of grant-related expenditure assessments will be £1,260 million below the level of current expenditure? It means that £1 billion is being given to local authorities, yet £1,260 million will be taken away from them.

Mrs. Rumbold: That was an unworthy question and the hon. Gentleman is totally incorrect.

Buildings (Cleaning Technique)

16. Mr. Dalyell: asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his answer, 25 June, Official Report, column 320, he will recommend the wet, dripping water technique rather than dry blasting for cleaning all buildings for which he is responsible.

Sir George Young: No. The most appropriate method will be used in each case.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Minister aware that this is not a joking question, as the dry blasting technique has been an absolute disaster? Is not the wet healing technique much better?

Sir George Young: I am advised by the English Heritage Commission on technical matters of this kind, and I understand that in a few cases the dry method is preferable.

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about my proposals for the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement for Wales.

Local authorities have begun to plan their budgets for next year. To help them, I am today circulating to them my proposals for the key elements of the settlement. Copies of the material sent to Welsh councils have been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

Before outlining my proposals, I should like to comment briefly on the spending decisions of Welsh local authorities in the present year, particularly those of county councils.

The rate support grant settlement for 1986-87 made provision for overall total expenditure to increase by 4·9 per cent., or slightly more than the then forecast rate of inflation. County councils generally have budgeted to increase their spending in 1986-87 on average by 7·6 per cent. — far in excess of provision and inflation. Their decision resulted in high and damaging rate rises. District councils' spending was broadly in line with the settlement and they were able to limit their rate rises to an average of just over 5 per cent. Nevertheless, ratepayers in the Principality have had to face a combined rate rise averaging nearly 12·5 per cent. in 1986-87.

More than 50 per cent. of the rate income in Wales comes from non-domestic ratepayers. High and unpredictable rate rises are bad for business, hinder expansion and put jobs at risk. Earlier this month the CBI in Wales wrote to council leaders asking them to recognise the needs of business ratepayers and to set low rates in 1987. I endorse and repeat that plea on behalf of all ratepayers.

When the public expenditure White Paper was published in January, no decision had been taken about provision for local authorities' current expenditure for 1987-88, and the White Paper showed the same provision in cash terms for 1987-88 as for 1986-87. I now propose a current expenditure figure of £1,496 million. That is £67·8 million, or 4·75 per cent. more than authorities have budgeted to spend this year. I shall give details of the distribution of this sum between services in the autumn. Once again, I intend to make additional provision for local authority capital spending and this, too, will be detailed in the autumn.

Total relevant expenditure for RSG purposes is expected to be £1,732 million. That is almost £135 million more than total relevant expenditure at the main report stage for 1986-87 and £97 million, or 5·9 per cent., more than the amount that authorities have budgeted to spend in the current year.

Aggregate Exchequer grant in support of relevant expenditure will be £1,157 million, £90 million higher than the level in the main RSG report for 1986-87. The grant percentage is 66·8 per cent. — the same as that in the 1986-87 main report. Comparisons with the grant position for 1986-87, taking into account the effect of authorities' budget decisions, will not be possible until the Supplementary report for that year is published in the autumn.

In my discussions with the local authority associations about the 1987-88 settlement, they have stressed to me the need for as much stability as possible between years in the grant distribution mechanisms. At the same time, the mechanisms must be such as to exert pressure to keep spending in line with our plans. I have, therefore, decided to retain the basic block grant mechanisms used in the present year, with no expenditure targets for individual councils and the slope of the grant-related poundage schedule both above and below the 10 per cent. threshold remaining unchanged, but GRE will be set in line with overall provision.

The effect of this will be that, at the margin of spending, decisions to increase it will result in a cash reduction in grant and decisions to reduce it will produce considerable rating benefits. Furthermore, I have decided that there will be no recycling of any under-claim on grant in Wales in 1987-88. Wales will therefore be covered by the legislation to be introduced in the autumn announced yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Authorities will be able to plan ahead with certainty knowing that the grant they receive will be directly linked to their own spending decisions. This will assist in forward budgeting.

In his statement to the House yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced his intention to take action to prevent local authorities from circumventing the present local authority capital expenditure control system by using devices such as advanced and deferred purchase agreements to incur prescribed expenditure in earlier or later years than would ordinarily be the case. The requirement, which applies equally in Wales, became effective from midnight last night.

The Government's proposals for an improved capital control system were set out in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government". Responses have been received from the local authority associations and other interested bodies in Wales. With my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, I am urgently considering what steps should be taken. These proposals clearly offer local authorities in Wales a further opportunity to plan for stable expenditure levels while enabling them to pass on real benefits in services and low rate increases to their ratepayers. I sincerely hope that they will do so, and I commend my proposals to the House.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The right hon. Gentleman presents the settlement with evident relief this year because the expenditure assumption will be nearer to what authorities have said they need to spend than has previously been the case. Whether the statement achieves the objective of low rent increases remains to be seen. I am sceptical.

I note that, in the second table in the material mentioned in the statement, the county of West Glamorgan has a 9 per cent. increase in rate poundage. Among the districts, the increase goes as high as 30 per cent. while, in Meirionnydd, it is down by 10 per cent. The variation is as high as 40 per cent. on the Secretary of State's figures, and there is an increase as high as 30 per cent. I calculate that three quarters of the Welsh districts have increases of more than 4·75 per cent. — the right hon. Gentleman's provision for inflation. Some 15 authorities have a 10 per cent. increase or more.

Will the right hon. Gentleman respond concerning his assumptions on inflation? Does he understand that local government is labour-intensive? He calculates price inflation at 4·75 per cent., but wage inflation is certainly 7·5 per cent. I understand that the police forces have been awarded more than 7 per cent. We know that there is to be a major restructuring of teachers' salaries. Will the Government meet the previous Secretary of State for Education and Science's commitment to fund the teachers' pay award? There is insufficient funding for the new general certificate of secondary education examination. There is insufficient cash for joint financing in the Health Service.

How does the right hon. Gentleman propose to meet the severe pressures on social services caused by major increases in the elderly population in Wales? Does he agree that, if there are more clients, there is a reduction in real terms in provision? He might agree that every community wants better roads and buildings maintenance. Such pressures can unhinge the statement's arithmetic.

There have been cuts in local government finance. Does the right hon. Gentleman know that, between 1978-79 and 1986-87, the cut in rate support grant has been as high as 12·5 per cent.? Put another way, rate support grant paid to Wales is £556 million less in real terms now than in 1978-79.

I deeply regret what the Secretary of State said about recycled grants. That is major money lost to Wales. Does he remember that when he got the reluctant agreement of Welsh local authorities to change from targets to the toughened grant poundage system it was with the promise that any grant withheld as a result of toughened poundage would not be lost to Wales? That was an important consideration. Can he assure me that that cash will not be lost to the people of Wales? If he cannot promise that it is in some respects a betrayal.

I wish to deal with matters relating to changes in the grant mechanism. Does the Secretary of State remember the requests for the schedule to be lowered, for nil safety nets, for nil gain caps and for the level of threshold to reach 20 per cent.? Some 10 districts will have negative marginal rates of grant at 100 per cent. or more as a result of the grant mechanisms which he is using.

On capital, why did the Secretary of State not increase the proportion of housing receipts from 15 per cent. to 33 per cent., as he was requested to do? Even if our proportionate share in Wales was simply upgraded to the English 20 per cent., we would gain £16 million annually, and the right hon. Gentleman will agree that we have major problems in housing.

Does the Secretary of State know that the overall level of spending will provide too little scope for councils to tackle the decaying infrastructure of our communities? May I remind him that Her Majesty's inspectorate depicted disrepair at every level in our education service, especially in our valley communities?

This appears to be a settlement from the cosmetician's angle. It does not repair the severe damage of yesteryear. The ministerial version of the status quo is unacceptable. The settlement has not commanded the support of Welsh local authorities, and contains in its detail a shabby deal on the recycling of grants. It is gravely defective on estimated inflation levels for next year. It does not address itself to the urgent need for comprehensive, major investment in schools, hospitals and houses. There are glaring omissions concerning the funding of teachers' and firemen's pay. It will not save the Conservative party. A Labour Government will restore the freedoms of local government in Wales.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has always considered himself to be rather good at theatre, and that was certainly a theatrical, if unrealistic, performance. He talked about cosmetics. My announcement was that there will be aggregate Exchequer grant amounting to about £1,200 to every household in Wales.

The hon. Gentleman had to admit at the beginning of his remarks that the statement might be greeted with relief, but the extent to which it will be greeted with relief by ratepayers entirely depends on the decisions of local authorities. Apart from the fact that the base of the settlement is extremely generous—I shall return to that—the negative marginal rates mean that if local authorities spend high above the settlement, their ratepayers will have a high bill to pay, while if local authorities spend below the level of the settlement—I believe that that is certainly within the power of many districts—there can be substantial rate reductions.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that we start from a base which itself involves reductions, because the £5 million of recycled grant from last year was given back to local authorities on the understanding, which they fully accepted, that that money would be used first to reduce rate bills. Therefore, there is that reduction to feed into the system even before the effects of this settlement.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the fact that there are differences between local authorities. The overall rating effects vary from council to council and from district to district. The higher impact is usually on those authorities that have taken action in the previous year which affects the marginal rate in the current year. Therefore, it is substantially a consequence of past decisions. The overall effect of the settlement for Wales is for nil or very low rate increases. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the rate effects in individual districts, he will see that that is so.

The hon. Gentleman talked about pay. He seemed to assume that pay increases are unrelated to the increase in inflation and that they have no effect on the pattern of spending by local authorities. People must understand that high pay settlements, way above the current rate of inflation, are bound to have consequences on services and employment. That must be borne in mind.

The hon. Gentleman did not seem to recognise that the increase in Wales of 4·75 per cent. of current expenditure is 1 per cent. higher than in England. That is because of the substantially better and lower spending performance of Welsh local authorities in the past. As they have performed better than the English authorities, it would have been wrong for them not to receive some recognition in the statement. I expect to be able to make additional capital allocations later in the year.

The hon. Gentleman asked about recycled grant. Local authorities asked for stability. It was not sensible to continue with a system that meant that individual local authorities' decisions could be severely affected by the spending decisions of other local authorities. If Welsh local authorities collectively spend on the lines of the settlement, no grant will be lost to Wales. It is very much up to the local authorities. The hon. Gentleman commented on grant mechanisms. I have pointed out that the principal request we received was for stability. I have commented on the hon. Gentleman's point about negative marginal rate.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about capital and housing allocations. No decisions on capital spending have been announced. I made it perfectly clear in my statement that we are still reviewing the capital control system. We shall make announcements about capital spending later in the year, after we have considered the points that the hon. Gentleman has made, as well as local government representations.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Does my right hon. Friend find it disheartening that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) is apparently reconciled to the inevitability of permanent high inflation — certainly in the foreseeable future — far above the ordinary figure of inflation? Is it not a fact that the figures cited by my right hon. Friend deserve a welcome by local authorities, as they should be able to avoid the excessive increases that caused so much distress last year?

Mr. Edwards: I acknowledge that they start from a much sounder, stronger base. They acknowledge that relevant expenditure will be 8·4 per cent. higher than total relevant expenditure at the main report stage in 1986-87, and nearly 6 per cent. higher than budgets.

My hon. Friend referred to the expected inflation rate. Most people, when they talk about 3·75 per cent., talk about the projected growth in costs in the economy as a whole, as spelt out in the Budget statement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The settlement gives Wales a further 1 per cent. on top of that.

If my right hon. Friend were to do a further forecast at this time, the figure would be significantly lower than at the time of the Budget. That factor is working entirely in favour of the local authorities. I remind my hon. Friend that the £5 million recycled grant this year was the base, and that there is an opportunity for local government to have low rate increases, or even rate reductions, in Wales.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the rate support grant system is obviously designed to prevent everyone, including possibly the Secretary of State, from knowing exactly what is going on, is the right hon. Gentleman willing to make a wild guess at how much he purports to restore to, say, the council of Blaenau Gwent of the money which his previous rate support grant system took away from it?

Mr. Edwards: This is an extremely generous settlement. We have maintained grants at the same percentage as last year. The decisions on spending will depend on local authorities. Our proposals for reforms of local government finance have been spelt out in detail. We have been consulting in detail on them. We wait with fascination to see when the Labour party gets around to putting forward some reform proposals of its own.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd North-West): Is not the ungainly floundering of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) a tribute to the skill with which my right hon. Friend has managed to tinker with the manifestly unroadworthy vehicle of local government finance to keep it on the road? Is my right hon. Friend aware how welcome will be his decision not to proceed with the ludicrous and complicated system of recycling, which made it impossible for local authorities to plan ahead with foreknowledge?

Mr. Edwards: I think that many people will welcome the stability it gives and the certainty in planning. Because Clwyd acted responsibly last year, it has come out well in the settlement. The rate increases which can be expected should be low, and reductions are possible.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): The Secretary of State has announced a 4·75 per cent. increase. Compared with what has happened in the past, that is a vast improvement, but we must consider it in its historical context. Our experience in previous years has not been good. There has been a crisis in the education sector — [HON MEMBERS: "Reading."] — which has suffered tremendously, and in housing. There is a crisis in one of the boroughs which I represent — Brecknock — where 1,000 people are on the housing waiting list. I would welcome the right hon. Gentleman's assurance that more money will be recycled into the housing sector. In addition, there is a crisis in respect of road bridges, with 23 out of action in Powys. I hope——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must ask a question.

Mr. Livsey: Is the Secretary of State aware that 23 bridges in Powys are out of action? Will he assure me that resources will be made available to repair them so that hardship can be alleviated?

Mr. Edwards: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's declaration that this settlement represents a vast improvement, but I wish that the same could be said of the line of his questioning. The hon. Gentleman talks about a crisis in education. I well remember the entirely false allegation which he put around during his by-election campaign that a school was to be closed which no one intended to close. That is the type of myth that the Liberal party likes to put around. As for housing and other capital projects, including bridges, I have said that this is not an announcement on capital expenditure. That will come later.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his excellent statement and on the extremely generous settlement. Does he agree that, if local authorities are to take full advantage of it, they must make a concerted effort to keep pay settlements down, which may mean getting tough with the National and Local Government Officers Association? Following on from the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer), will my right hon. Friend give just one assurance that for Clwyd this year there will be no repeat of what his officials called the "unfortunately" wide difference last year between the provisional and final block grant figures?

Mr. Edwards: It is precisely to avoid such change and uncertainty that we are doing away with recycling and going for stability. There is no doubt that local authorities find it difficult to plan. They now know that they can succeed on the basis that what they will get will be a direct consequence of their decisions. That is a great step forward.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the calculation of block grants is based on rateable values obtaining on 30 September? Why is no allowance made if the rateable value is subsequently reduced unless the reduction is greater than the figure which has been determined by the Secretary of State, which is at present 2·5 per cent.? Is the right hon. Genteman aware that, in many cases, substantial reductions in rateable value take place? Is he further aware that, in the case of the borough of Neath — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Grow up, will you please? I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I was referring to Conservative Members. Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that the contraction of the BP oil refinery in Neath is an example of that problem? Will he undertake to look urgently at this matter to see what can be done?

Mr. Edwards: Adjustments are made as a result of the closure of industrial premises. However, I shall certainly look specifically at the constituency point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Is my right hon. Friend aware that he should be congratulated on his handling of local government finance in that he is able to come before the House with this welcome statement? Would he like to hazard a guess at what South Glamorgan county council is likely to do having followed its irresponsible record rate rise last year?

Mr. Edwards: I fear that one of the consequences of the sort of decisions taken by South Glamorgan may continue to affect those who live in the area. I hope that with this generous and soundly based settlement in front of them, the local authority will recognise that, but by the sort of rate increases it went for last year, it is discouraging the very sort of development that elsewhere it is trying to get going. Therefore, I hope that the message that the confederation of British Industry gave so clearly about the impact of high rating will be heeded on this occasion.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): How will the Secretary of State's statement help the 29 per cent. of men who are unemployed in my constituency, and how will it help Mid Glamorgan with its massive social and economic problems? Will he confirm that the amount announced is a mere fraction of the amount taken away from Welsh local authorities since 1979? Will he tell us how much the Treasury intends to claw back from this amount?

Mr. Edwards: Because the settlement is realistic, it will give Welsh local authorities, including that in the hon. Lady's constituency, every scope for maintaining social provision and services and keeping rate increases down, which will help to attract the industry and jobs she so badly wants. The only circumstance in which there will be claw back, that is to say where there will not be the full benefit because of grant recycling, is if local authorities generally in Wales go above the spending pattern that the settlement indicates. It is certainly within the power of the Welsh local government to ensure that there is no loss through that.

Mr. Keith Best: (Ynys Môn): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his statement is much more generous than the one he made on 25 July last year, for two reasons? First, his proposals will assist forward budgeting, the absence of which has so badly hampered local authorities in planning in the past? Secondly, will he confirm that total relevant expenditure for RSG purposes is this year 5·9 per cent. more than budgeted for by local authorities, whereas last year it was only 5 per cent. more? Would the pontifications of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) about the effect of wage increases not be much more persuasive if he were to take the same realistic view that the Trades Union Congress now seems to be taking which is that it should intervene in wage negotiations between local authorities and employees to ensure that there are moderate wage settlements because of the effect they have on expenditure?

Mr. Edwards: As my hon. Friend knows, last year we hoped that Welsh local government would maintain the good spending record that it had previously. In those circumstances, there may be some who feel that this settlement is over-generous. The fact is that we have taken account of actual spending patterns in the past and have now made generous provision against the expectation of the increase in costs in the current year. Therefore, there is no doubt that this settlement gives Welsh local government a considerable opportunity to maintain services and lower the rate burden. There is still plenty of scope for Welsh local government to prove its efficiency on the lines that it is beginning to acknowledge and which has been pointed out by the Audit Commission and others.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Can I put it to the Secretary of State that this is not a good settlement for Wales — just not quite as bad as we have come to expect from him? His claim that local authorities in Wales will be the prime determinant of rate increases comes a bit rich from a member of a Cabinet which is forcing through the House measures which will result in a 20 per cent. increase in the rate bills of the poorest people in our communities. As he was so complimentary about Welsh local authorities, why has he not decided to fight to exempt them from the recycling provision?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman can put it to me, but he is wrong. This is a good settlement. It is one thing to argue that everyone living in a local authority area should make some contribution to the rating costs so that they are aware that there are costs to be paid for the services provided, and another to argue for lowering the rate bills and rate costs generally. The people who are paying that percentage will benefit from the lower costs just as much as others.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. I trust that he agrees that this year's sharp practices by local councils in Wales should never again be repeated. I press him on the answer that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist), which disturbed me. Will he give further consideration to the plight of my constituents, so that they will not again be the worst hit in Wales by South Glamorgan county council, a council that is notorious for its monstrous rate increases? Recent years have included increases of 94, 54 and 24 per cent., the latter being for this year. That burden seems to get better only because of the Government's success in conquering inflation.

Mr. Edwards: I agree with my hon. Friend that the record of that authority in recent years has been disgraceful. If the local authorities in my hon. Friend's area spend in line with the settlement, there is no reason why rate increases should be more than 1 or 2 per cent.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the Secretary of State accept that maintaining the status quo is not good enough when the status quo involved potholes in the roads, social services that cannot be delivered to those who need them, and a substantial bill for the education settlement coming through soon? Will he confirm that at 4·75 per cent., 1 per cent. above the GDP deflator, the figure is still 0·5 per cent. short of what is needed for the education settlement? That means that Wales will be £7 to £8 million short of what is needed to pay the teachers. That being so, shall we not either lose teachers or cut other services to finance the settlement?

Mr. Edwards: No, I think that this is untrue. The hon. Gentleman failed to listen to the answer that I gave earlier, when I pointed out that not only is the settlement above the GDP deflator, but the GDP deflator was a forecast made a considerable time ago, since when inflation has continued to fall. What is more, there has been a substantial increase in the amount allocated as the base from which local authorities start this year. Against that background, I cannot see that local authorities have the problems that he describes.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): Will the Secretary of State give the House three figures, one for Wales, one for the borough of Lliw Valley and one for Swansea city council? Will he precede the three figures by either a plus or a minus? What have been the changes in real terms in the cash awarded in the rate support settlement for 1986-87 compared to 1978-79?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Gentleman tables that question, I shall answer it.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): The Secretary of State can rarely answer a reasonable question. It is like his statements. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) that the rate support grant is confusing enough, but having a Secretary of State for Wales such as that which we have makes the matter even more confusing. When the right hon. Gentleman talks about recycling, I should like to suggest that he gets on his bike.

The right hon. Gentleman was asked a question by the Ogwr borough council, which appealed with him to meet it in the House and discuss with it the way that his Government and his actions have ensured that the council's development status has been down-graded in two places. I appeal to him to reconsider the matter, so that it can benefit, if there is any benefit to come out of the statement, in a proper and reasonable way.

Mr. Edwards: I know that the hon. Gentleman finds these matters difficult to understand, but his question has not the smallest connection with the statement that I have just made.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Is the Secretary of State aware that when he said that Clwyd county council behaved last year, as he put it, responsibly, it has meant for those of us who live in Clwyd worse roads, growing dereliction on the roadways, less education provision and worse social services, and a general contribution to the shabbiness and lower quality of life with which we have had to put up from the social services? As the Secretary of State knows, rate support grants taken from Wales by this Government have amounted to £500 million since 1978-79. How much more rate support grant will be lost as a result of this statement?

Mr. Edwards: Again, the hon. Gentleman has clearly not been listening, because I have already told the House several times that the rate support grant percentage is unchanged this year.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, North): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the generosity that he is pretending to display is an exercise in duplicity, for over the years local government has had to put up with rate capping, the freezing of receipts from the sale of council houses, clawback, and restrictions of one kind or another. The latest example is the cheating over the recycling of grants.

When will the Secretary of State recognise the reality that Wales is about the most deprived area in western Europe? Heavy unemployment places a far greater burden on our local authorities and the services that they administer. Our education system is creaking at the seams, and the Secretary of State has not made clear how the teachers' award will be funded bearing in mind the inflation tendency.

Will the right hon. Gentleman also recognise that we have a massive housing problem, with thousands of properties lacking basic amenities, and that vast expenditure is required on our infrastructure to make the place a little more inviting for prospective new enterprises? Is it not sheer hypocrisy for the Secretary of State to urge local authorities to ease the burden on ratepayers when the right hon. Gentleman is the culprit who has done so much damage to local government and those whom it serves? Does he appreciate that we recognise, in the run-up to a general election, that he is trying to create a mirage of optimism? He will not be believed because the neglect and decay have gone on for too long.

Mr. Edwards: We all know that Opposition Members love to create an image of Wales in gloom, decay and depression, whatever the damage that it does to Wales, and however much it discourages job creation. The hon. Gentleman has led the field in that disreputable and damaging task.

The hon. Gentleman started by accusing me of rate-capping, when there has never been rate-capping in Wales. He accused me of cheating over recycling, but there has never been cheating over recycling. Some may think that a system under which some local authorities were penalised because of the decisions of other local authorities represented a form of cheating that we should do well to get rid of. The stability and security that this gives local authorities will be welcomed.

In his account of the relevant position between Wales and England, the hon. Gentleman failed to mention that there is a considerably higher grant percentage for Welsh local authorities than in England, that we are allocating more capital, and have done so because of the relatively good spending record of most Welsh authorities, and could have done even better if they had maintained that good record last year. Finally, I repeat that the onus for high rate bills this year will not be on the Government. If they rise, that will be solely the responsibility of local government.

Rate Support Grant (Scotland)

4.10 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement about local authority expenditure and rate support grant in Scotland.

I would first like to deal with 1987-88. For that year I propose to set the level of provision for local authority relevant current expenditure in Scotland at £3,277 million. This figure is 3·75 per cent. above local authorities' adjusted budgets for 1986-87 and is a reasonable assessment of what they are likely to spend, given the level of inflation and their past pattern of spending. It recognises the efforts made by increasing numbers of authorities to budget at or below guideline.

I propose to set aggregate Exchequer grant for 1987-88 at £2,160 million. This will maintain, on present estimates of loans charges and other financing items, the present grant percentage of 56·1 per cent.

I consider that my proposals on provision and grant represent a fair and realistic settlement for next year. In making these proposals I have taken careful account of the points made to me by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. I met the convention on 18 July when we discussed expenditure prospects for next year. My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Environment met the convention this morning to outline these proposals to them.

Given this realistic settlement, there is no reason for rate increases next year, unless local authorities increase their spending next year above inflation or fail to bring their spending to guideline in the current year. I very much hope that local authorities will, in the interests of their ratepayers, respond positively to these proposals.

I turn now to 1986-87. Scottish local authorities have budgeted for 1986-87 to spend £118 million, or 3·9 per cent. more than the current expenditure guidelines which were issued to them. Authorities were given ample warning that the penalties for exceeding guidelines would again be severe. I have therefore decided, having consulted the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on my proposals last week, to impose grant penalties for 1986-87 totalling £125 million. I will be laying the necessary rate support grant order shortly and grant reductions will start on 30 July. Copies of the report on the order showing how the penalties will affect each local authority are available in the Vote Office. Letters of notification are being posted to authorities today.

Penalties will again be calculated using a tariff which relates the penalty to the level of excess over guideline. The tariff will, to a greater extent than last year, concentrate the penalties on the highest overspenders. In particular, the four authorities which are responsible for 90 per cent. of the overspending will all have a penalty which is larger than in 1985-86.

Local authorities as a whole are increasingly budgeting within guidelines. In 1986-87, 40 out of the 65 authorities budgeted within guidelines and will suffer no penalty. I hope that the 25 remaining authorities which are responsible for the overspending in 1986-87 will make every effort to reduce their expenditure at outturn and thus recover the grant penalty which I have just announced. There are considerable benefits to authorities in doing so. In 1985-86, local authorities responded to penalties by bringing down their overspend from £91 million to £47 million and penalties will correspondingly be reduced from £126 million to £57 million. The advantages of spending within guideline are considerable and I hope that in 1986-87 there will again be many authorities modifying their spending to be within guideline at outturn.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I am glad to see any sign of repentance on the Government Front Bench and I take some satisfaction from the fact that the sustained campaign in defence of local services has forced the Scottish Office to pause and, hopefully, to think about what it has done in previous years. I offer a very sober and qualified welcome to part of this announcement. Undoubtedly the figures are better than those for last year. It is remarkable how entering the fourth year of a Parliament concentrates the minds of Ministers on survival.

The Government claim that the 1987-88 announcement amounts to a standstill. Typically, a status quo is the height of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's ambitions, but will he take note of our doubts about the adequacy of the inflation factor? He knows that manual workers in Scottish local authorities have rejected an offer of 6 per cent., that clerical and administrative staff have rejected an offer of 5·9 per cent. and that 55 per cent. of regional council budgets is spent on wages and salaries? Against that background, an inflation figure of 3·75 per cent. seems to me to be highly suspect. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that COSLA estimates that there will have to be an increase of £70 million over and above the relevant expenditure figure that has been announced today in order to have a standstill budget.

Will the Secretary of State say a word or two about the 3·75 per cent. and how it was formulated? He will be aware that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales announced an inflation factor of 4·75 per cent. in the Principality and suggested that this was some sort of reward, because he felt that Welsh local authorities had performed reasonably well. Will the Secretary of State confirm that the inflation factor should be an attempt genuinely to estimate what the rise in prices in terms of Scottish local authority expenditure is likely to be? Does he accept that an inflation factor of 3·75 per cent. is inadequate?

The formula for the 1986-87 penalties has been varied. The penalty is less steep, despite what the Secretary of State said. However, there is no cause for celebration. Although the figures give the impression that concessions have been made, the clawback of £125 million is almost exactly the same as it was in the previous year. Furthermore, well over half the population of Scotland — not just four authorities; that is misleading — will be penalised on what I believe to be an unjust and unjustifiable basis.

How does the Secretary of State expect Strathclyde to find £76 million in the remainder of this financial year? If it is such a reasonable system, why is Lothian being penalised by £25 million on a budget that was formulated by his political friends in the Tory administration? Will the Secretary of State also comment on the fact that, as far as I can see — although I am open to correction — no account at all has been taken of the agreement that has been reached with Edinburgh to reduce its expenditure by £6·5 million and to re-rate to that effect? That factor has been completely ignored. If it were taken into account, the penalty of well over £10 million would be well under half that amount. Does that not illustrate the arbitrary nature of the system and the extraordinary way that it is operated? Why should Edinburgh have to lie out of this money, causing extra expense to its ratepayers, when an agreement has been reached between the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the district council?

Finally, on rates, will the Secretary of State note that everything depends upon the distribution formula? I hope that he will give help and lend a sympathetic ear to those authorities that face very real problems and that are genuinely struggling to meet guidelines. I hope that he will not use the increased aggregate Exchequer grant as a reward for cynical political purposes to help those who are already comfortably placed. Does he accept that, to any impartial observer, it is perfectly clear that this Government's strategy has been based upon hostility to local government—an assumption about irresponsible and profligate expenditure that cannot be justified—and that no account has been taken of the strain that has been placed on basic and essential services?

Although this announcement is better than some that we have had to endure in the past, it will do nothing to remove the pressures on many authorities in 1987-88. Although the settlement represents progress, it is very slow and grudging. I was taught very early in life to recognise that one should be thankful for small mercies, but this announcement will do nothing to undo the damage that has been done to local democracy since the right hon. and learned Gentleman's party hijacked the Scottish Office seven years ago.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the general welcome that he has given to my announcement. I acknowledge the predictable qualifications that he felt it was appropriate to add to his general welcome. Nevertheless, it would be right to interpret his response as congratulating the Government on the provision that they have made for Scottish local authorities, and I am happy to accept it on that basis.

The hon. Gentleman asked for an explanation of the generous provision that we are making. There are two factors that he ought to bear in mind. For the first time, this year's settlement, in volume terms, is slightly below what it was in 1979. In addition, the budgets of two thirds of Scottish local authorities are now either at or below guideline. Therefore, it seemed to me and to my colleagues that it was right and proper that that should be reflected in the provision that we are making available. That is the explanation for that factor.

The hon. Gentleman took issue with the inflation projection. He will be aware that we have taken inflation into account at a projected rate of 3·75 per cent. for the purposes of determining provision. He is correct to say that local authorities are assuming a higher rate of inflation, but he cannot expect the taxpayer to fund any pay settlement that local authorities might choose to make. He gave the House information about pay claims made by various groups of local authority employees. We are well aware that bids and offers can be made, but it is right for local authorities to take into account the national rate of inflation and to expect their employees to take it into account. The figure of 3·75 per cent. is perfectly realistic for that purpose.

The hon. Gentleman asked about Strathclyde and about the penalties announced for the current year. Strathclyde also had a heavy penalty last year, but during that year—perhaps because of the penalty—we saw a substantial reduction in expenditure at outturn. There is no reason of which I am aware why we should not anticipate a similar reduction in expenditure by Strathclyde this year. I suspect it was anticipating a much higher penalty than has been announced, and it should find no difficulty whatever in achieving significant reductions during the financial year.

The hon. Gentleman was correct when he said that the voluntary reduction in Edinburgh district council's proposed expenditure has not affected the way in which the penalty is distributed. Edinburgh will at outturn receive repayment of rate support grant to take account of the expenditure at the end of the day. Edinburgh district council may be reducing its budget as a result of direct pressure from the Scottish Office and the threat of parliamentary action. Other local authorities may also be revising their budgets and it would be quite wrong to single out one authority that has acted on a voluntary basis to avoid the proposed penalty. If at outturn the figures for original budgets have been reduced, as we hope they will be, then the penalty based on the original budget will be revised and local authorities will receive any grant that they had forfeited.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I welcome the statement by my right hon. and learned Friend. It should help prudent local authorities to keep down their rates and propose no increase for next year. When he makes the settlement, can he ensure that it is weighted in favour of authorities that have behaved prudently in the past and have kept their rates down? Will he bear it in mind that rural areas had some catching up to do after revaluation and see that they get priority in the settlement?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for welcoming the announcement. As he knows, in recent years the whole system of penalties has been changed to ensure that those local authorities which budget at or below guideline run no risk of forfeiting any rate support grant. Therefore, the £125 million that I have announced will not in any way affect my hon. Friend's regional council which has budgeted within the guideline.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The Minister has said that this settlement is based on the past pattern of spending. Is it not plain that, despite falling school rolls, it will prevent education authorities improving education provision and will compel the closure of still more rural schools? How on earth the teachers' pay settlement will be dealt with is a mystery. Local authorities will be unable to make better provision through their social work departments, despite the enormous pressure upon them to do so.

Mr. Rifkind: I find the hon. Gentleman's intervention incomprehensible. We are all aware that in recent years pupil rolls have fallen by about 18 per cent. in Scotland. That enables local authorities to concentrate their education provision on a smaller number of pupils. That should enable them to make better provision.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the teachers' pay settlement. In determining provision for next year, account has been taken, and is incorporated in these figures, of the settlement that local authorities have reached with the teaching unions. For that reason, that part of the hon. Gentleman's question is superfluous.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his excellent statement. Is it to be expected that anything that my right hon. and learned Friend produces will be sour grapes to the Opposition. This statement will be of considerable benefit to local authorities in Scotland, where 40 out of the 65 local authorities have met their deadline. That is a great credit to Government measures. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) made a plea on behalf of rural areas. I support that, because rural areas have to maintain an infrastructure in order to try to retain the rural population and avoid depopulation.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend should not be too upset by the carping comments of the Opposition. By the standards of the Labour party, what they said was a compliment to the Government and we can take that into account. We bear in mind the developmental needs of specific areas when determining capital allocations and provisions. The needs of each local authority are given intense scrutiny.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): The Minister's statement is a continuation of the punitive policy that the Government have pursued against local government in Scotland. Is it not the case that the guidelines are unrealistic and unworkable? Instead of inventing poll taxes, the Secretary of State would do far better to set about establishing a proper working relationship with the local authorities so that they may be properly funded.

Mr. Rifkind: If the guidelines are unrealistic, it is surprising that some two thirds of Scottish local authorities have been able to budget within them.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the Scottish share of United Kingdom expenditure has been falling? There will be no great celebrations because the rate support grant has been kept static. [Interruption.] I am dealing with facts. One of the authorities omitted from the list of those which kept within the guidelines is the local authority in my constituency, the Western Isles islands council. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that all its essential services have been cut to the bone and that it has to make a drastic effort to keep to the levels to which it is tied? How will it fare if it cannot get any advance on the funds that have been available?

Mr. Rifkind: As the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges, his own islands council has felt able to budget within guidelines, and, contrary to what the right hon. Gentleman suggests, that is a factor to bear in mind. The provision that I have announced will enable that council to continue a level of expenditure consistent with that position.

Mr. Alexander Pollock (Moray): Now that the Government seem to recognise the virtue of supporting local authorities by holding public expenditure constant, can my right hon. and learned Friend tell me the implications for the capital consent programme, bids for which are due a little later this year? Will he consider especially the problem facing Grampian region? It has a road building programme that will need substantial additional capital consents. Those roads are needed to give proper support to the timber industry in that region, given the expansion at Dalcross and the other efforts by timber growers there.

Mr. Rifkind: I am aware that the timber industry in Grampian and Dumfries and Galloway is relevant to the capital allocations. No doubt there are other authorities in a similar position. We have invited regional councils to tell us the details of their requirements so that we can take them into account when capital allocations are determined.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that, after six years of serious cuts in local government grants and attacks on local government services, even this standstill settlement, although it is set at a low level, makes us all feel like cheering? In order to show his good faith and to remove the suspicion that this might be a pre-election settlement, is the right hon. and learned Gentleman prepared to look again at the clawback of the £76 million penalty that he has imposed on Strathclyde and the £50,000 penalty that he has imposed on Cunninghame district?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman, who is always a fair man, will — [Interruption.] I think so, even if Labour Members apparently do not. I certainly acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman is a fair man and he will know that reductions in local authority provision did not begin seven years ago but some 10 years ago under a Government whom the hon. Gentleman consistently voted against whenever the rate support grant was announced. I seem to remember that he has been consistent in each of the past 10 years in voting against local authority provision, irrespective of who proposed it.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, over the past year, certainly Strathclyde, and I suspect Cunninghame, have been able to reduce their expenditure on outturn and that has enabled significant amounts of grant to be returned. The very fact that we have imposed the heaviest penalties at the upper end of overspending will give that much greater incentive for reductions in expenditure.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the Secretary of State clarify what he said in response to an earlier question about the impact of the settlement of the teachers' dispute in Scotland? He gave the impression that the settlement had taken that into account and would in some way act as a ceiling upon the deliberations of Professor Main.

Mr. Rifkind: No; I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what I said. In determining provision for local authorities for 1987-88, we have taken into account not only the budgets that they fixed but the pay settlement that was reached after the budgets had been fixed with the teaching unions, because clearly that must be added to the budgets in order to achieve a realistic figure.

Mr. John Corrie (Cunninghame, North): I warmly welcome the fact that the rate support grant has not been cut again this year, as that inevitably leads to increases in rates, although it helps to control expenditure. May I take it from the statement that, with only a few exceptions, we are now reaching the sort of expediture levels that my right hon. and learned Friend wants to see in councils in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: The latter part of my hon. Friend's question must be taken into account. It is true that 40 out of 65 authorities have budgeted either at or below guideline and that a number of other individual authorities are at a level only marginally above. But my hon. Friend will recall my comment earlier that four local authorities are responsible for 90 per cent. of the excess, and that is a matter for severe concern.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): What comfort will this give to Strathclyde regional council in its efforts to eliminate composite classes in primary schools, when one in three primary schools have composite classes? In addition, what comfort will it give to Motherwell district council, bearing in mind the terrible unemployment there? Do not mention the food park, because that is not labour-intensive.

Mr. Rifkind: If the hon. Gentleman has discussions with either Strathclyde region or Motherwell district, he will find that it will tell him, privately if not publicly, that this provision is substantially greater than it had anticipated.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that this welcome statement, which gives encouragement to Scottish ratepayers to expect a similar or lower rate bill in the coming year, owes much to the Government's success in persuading more Socialist authorities to budget at or near guidelines? Will he make further efforts to see that the track record of prudent local government management will be rewarded in rate support grant settlements?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct. It is worth pointing out that local authorities are spending in volume terms for all practical purposes the same as in 1979. It has taken a number of years to reach that position, and it is good that they have now done so.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): The impression is being created that this is a less worse settlement for ratepayers in the coming year. Is this the first sign of the advice that the Government have given to the inquiry committee on teachers' pay and of the settlement that he expects, or can local authorities expect a supplement to the rate support grant if the teachers' settlement is higher?

Mr. Rifkind: The Government's evidence to the Main inquiry has been published and is available for the hon. Gentleman to study if he so wishes. We have not yet even received the recommendations of the Main report and obviously I cannot comment at this stage on what our response will be to recommendations of which neither we, the unions nor the local authorities are aware.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The Minister stated that he is looking for more cuts from authorities such as Strathclyde and Glasgow district. The Minister must know that, in communities such as my own, youth unemployment is very high and that the only people who seem to be trying to tackle that serious problem are the local authorities. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Hon. members say no, but I know of no private employer who is trying to get the young people off the street in the way that Glasgow district council is by attempting to get apprenticeships and by taking the Manpower Services Commission——

Mr. Rifkind: That is Government money.

Mr. Martin: It is not the Government's money. It is the taxpayers' money. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

The Minister asked local authorities to participate in the MSC schemes. He knows that Strathclyde region and Glasgow district have not only participated but have tried to make permanent work for the young people in those schemes. The Minister knows that he is endangering the prospects of young people in our communities.

The Minister may know that a deputation was received from the people in the Barrmulloch area because the local authority intended to close down the community centres at the weekend. What chance is there of cutting down vandalism if the community centres are not open?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman should appreciate that it is not just Glasgow district and Strathclyde region that are participating in the youth training scheme and using, as he correctly says, taxpayers' money to help employment in their locality. Virtually all 65 authorities are participating in the scheme. If 40 out of those 65 can participate in the youth training scheme and still have budgets at or below guideline, there is no particular reason why Glasgow district and Strathclyde region cannot do so as well.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, within the additional resources that he has made available to local authorities in Scotland, there is ample scope for them to use their powers to give discretionary rate reductions to amateur sports clubs in Scotland? What was the result of discussions with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on that issue? Can we now expect local authorities which said that if they had these resources they would act to do so?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. Already, a number of Scottish local authorities are giving discretionary rate relief to sports clubs. A number are not, and have sought to suggest that Government restrictions prevented them from being more generous. As my announcement today represents an increase in aggregate Exchequer grant of 7·5 per cent., or £152 million, my hon. Friend is correct to say that, if that is all that was stopping them using their discretion, as the 100 per cent. rates relief for sports clubs has been estimated to be about £3 million or £4 million, and as no one expects or would wish to see such a high level of rate relief, there can be no excuse now for any authority that wants to use its discretion not feeling free to do so.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Secretary of State concede that we are all rather bemused by his and the Secretary of State for the Environment's exercise in raiding the contingency fund just prior to an anticipated general election in a year or so? Why is local government expenditure profligate when the Exchequer has to support it to the tune of 60 per cent. or over, while it is an exercise in probity when the Exchequer has to support it at 56·5 per cent., as is the case today? When has a regional council such as Fife embarked on excessive expenditure? Can he identify any expenditure in Fife that commands the penalties that he seeks to impose? Where, against the background of increasing unemployment and the increasing devastation of our industrial base, is any wasteful expenditure to be found?

Mr. Rifkind: As I understand it, Fife regional council was able, during last year, to reduce its expenditure by some £7 million, which suggests that the original budget was not the bare minimum that it could afford. The hon. Gentleman should ask himself why so many Scottish local authorities have been able to spend either at or below guideline—[AN HON. MEMBER: "They have not enjoyed it."] It is not a question of whether they have enjoyed doing so. There is no evidence that, in the two thirds of local authorities that are spending within guideline, services to the community are significantly different from those in areas that are overspending. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman should inquire about the reasons for that.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): There is nothing cheerful about the figures for Kilmarnock and Loudoun for they have been mallied. Kilmarnock and Loudoun is kind but not extravagant. Its only crime was to protect jobs and services. The authority must knock approximately £500,000 off the intended expenditure. That means several hundred jobs lost in an area which already has almost 20 per cent. unemployment. Would the Secretary of State care to tell me, so that I can tell the lads in Kilmarnock, how the authority can cut that expenditure without job losses?

Mr. Rifkind: Ayrshire Labour Members appear to be deeply divided about their proper response to my announcement. One wants to cheer and the other is worried.

Mr. McKelvey: My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) said "jeering", not "cheering".

Mr. Rifkind: That is not what I heard.

When the hon. Gentleman discusses the announcement with his district council he will discover that it considers the provision generous and considerably higher than it expected. The provision will enable the council to plan expenditure for next year on a realistic basis.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the rate support grant which he has announced today shows clearly how far Britain has recovered from the day when the Labour Administration went to the International Monetary Fund? That followed many years when Britain had to be careful about taxpayers' money, borrowing and expenditure. Does he also agree that the best way to deal with the frivolous expenditure of local authorities, especially on such items as nuclear-free zones and conferences, is to ensure that others, such as those who run caravan sites which are an important part of the tourist industry, and who are concerned about the differences between their rates and the rates paid in England and Wales, are protected by continuing with the policy that we have been pursuing for years, which is to see that ratepayers get value for money?

Mr. Rifkind: It can only be in the interests of the local community if local authorities confine themselves to matters for which they clearly have responsibility.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I return to the answer given to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston)? The Secretary of State talked about concentrating educational provision and mentioned an 18 per cent. drop in the number of pupils. Is the entire package conditional upon the closure of schools? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If it is not, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had better make the position clear. What did the answer given to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber mean if it was not the closure of schools?

Is not the real answer to do something about class sizes, not least in the light of last night's vote? We have an opportunity to achieve better and more favourable class ratios, which are much required in the light of last night's vote. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman address himself to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin), which inadvertently he did not answer, as to whether it makes sense for community centres to have to close at weekends because of a shortage of money? Those places were built in the 1950s and 1960s at enormous expense, and socially it is highly desirable that they should remain open at the weekend.

Mr. Rifkind: That is a matter to be determined according to the priorities of the local authority. The hon. Gentleman will agree with me that Glasgow and Strathclyde region has sufficient resources to do what it thinks appropriate about community centres, given the overall resources available to it. But my announcement today is not conditional on anything. It represents a significant increase in resources for local authorities—an extra £152 million of cash through the rate support grant system. The hon. Gentleman should appreciate that that is a fair and realistic basis for local authority expenditure next year.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that most people in Scotland will greatly welcome the announcement of extra resources today, and that it will be welcomed especially by local authorities which have shown prudence in their spending? Does he accept that most ratepayers in Scotland will welcome his assurance that there need be no increase in rates next year as a result of today's announcement? Will he give an undertaking that, despite all the huffing and puffing that we have heard from local authorities, he will continue to impose penalties where there is evidence of overspending?

Mr. Rifkind: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. It is because the majority of Scottish local authorities are now budgeting responsibly and constructively that it is possible and desirable for the Government to respond in a similar fashion.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): When the Secretary of State met the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, did he explain how he had managed to obtain from his Cabinet colleagues a protected inflation rate of 1 per cent. less than Wales, despite Wales' dynamic Secretary of State? Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman give COSLA the reasons for that difference? Did COSLA endorse the Government's proposals?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not recall COSLA being terribly interested in Welsh rate support grant provision but perhaps that will change. The level of local government expenditure in Wales has been, up to this year, dramatically lower than in either England or Scotland. Welsh authorities have kept within guidelines to a much greater extent than authorities in Scotland or England. I am sure that those factors were taken into account by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales in determining what provision to make.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) rose——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Foulkes.

Mr. Foulkes: I had expected to take on my hereditary position of sweeper, but I hand it over to my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson).

Two things are clear about the settlement from an initial consideration of the statistics. First, it is clearly political—[Interruption.]—party political—and there is an election approaching. For example, Argyll and Bute—one does not have to look far from the hon. Member who represents that area—gets an initial needs payment of £2·6 million, whereas East Kilbride and East Lothian receive about £900,000. Will the Secretary of State explain that?

Secondly, it is clear that the guidelines are completely arbitrary. Cumnock and Doon Valley is faced with a punitive penalty of 110 per cent. Can the Secretary of State explain to the local authority with the highest unemployment how it can cut its expenditure? It has the smallest administrative overheads. Should it close leisure facilities available to the unemployed? Should it stop advance factory building? Will the Secretary of State say exactly where the cuts can be made in an area such as Cumnock and Doon Valley?

Mr. Rifkind: First, my announcement today does not show the amounts going to any local authority. That is a matter which is determined by distribution principles, and nothing has been determined yet. Today I simply announced the global amounts. I hope that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that.

If Cumnock and Doon Valley wants to achieve economies, it might usefully take advice from the two thirds of Scottish local authorities which have found it possible to budget within guidelines.

Mr. Home Robertson: If I could sweep up the Secretary of State, I would be a happy man. He has been emphasising some rather contrived good news, but will he say something more about the bad news which he has tried to conceal? What about the £25·34 million which he proposes to impose by way of penalty on his constituents and mine, in Lothian region? What scope is there for cutting the services available to the people of Edinburgh, Pentlands or of East Lothian under Brian Meeks' Tory budget? Will the Minister tell us more about that? Will he also pay tribute to the fine tuning of East Lothian district council? Will its penalty of £1,762 cover the administrative costs of this absurd system of penalties and guidelines?

Mr. Rifkind: I have no doubt that, if the penalty is so small, East Lothian district council can ensure that there is no penalty at all. Even the hon. Gentleman will agree that that should not be beyond its wit and imagination. Lothian regional council is, indeed, one of the high overspending authorities and it is right and proper that we should have a system that imposes penalties only on those that are responsible for the excess. That is much fairer than the old system, when penalties were imposed on local authorities as a whole. That took no account of whether they had overspent. That was the system which the Labour Government seemed to prefer.

South Africa (Council of Ministers)

4.49 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I seek your guidance and, I hope, your support? On Monday 21 and Tuesday 22 July, the Foreign Affairs Council of the European Community met in Brussels under the Presidency for the first time of a British Foreign Secretary. A very serious report was given to it on the subject of South Africa by the Foreign Secretary, who is now perambulating his way around South Africa, being snubbed by all varieties of black opinion. He reported to Foreign Ministers of the European Community on his visit to the United States of America and on his conversations with Secretary Shultz and President Reagan, and informed them of his itinerary for this week.

But this afternoon there has been no report to the British House of Commons about that council meeting. We are left with a written answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) if we are to work out precisely what the Foreign Secretary intends to say to the South African Government and to those elements who may choose to meet him. Surely it is intolerable for the Foreign Office and the Foreign Secretary to treat the House like that, and not to pay us the elementary courtesy of reporting back from that Foreign Affairs Council. It leaves us asking what on earth the Foreign Office has to hide if it has to take such an unprecedented step following the first meeting held during our Presidency. It has simply hidden behind a slim written answer given this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, whether the Government make a statement is not a matter for the Chair. I have no control over that.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you a factual question? Is there any precedent for such behaviour? In my 24 years of involvement, I cannot recall a time when there has not been a statement on such an occasion. If senior Ministers have been ill, their place has been taken by junior Ministers. Is there any precedent for a report being given in the form of a written answer instead of a statement? The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office is certainly in the building.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): It may help the House if I say at once that it is by no means unprecedented for the proceedings of the Foreign Affairs Council to be reported to the House by means of a written answer. A case in point is the written reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) on 12 March 1986.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In normal circumstances, we would no doubt accept what the Leader of the House has said, but there are only two days to go before the recess, and it will be October before the Foreign Secretary or one of the Foreign Office Ministers will be standing at that Dispatch Box again. It is imperative that we should have a statement before the recess. I hope that the Leader of the House will ensure that there is a statement tomorrow afternoon or, if necessary, on Friday morning.

Mr. Biffen: This afternoon the House has a pretty full bill of fare, and I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman has tried to be helpful. Of course, we could look at this issue through the usual channels to see whether something could be done on Friday morning. But it should be placed on the record that last week we had a very authoritative debate on foreign affairs and on the South African issue. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary then gave the House the most authoritative report on the Government's position. He certainly would not have gone beyond that in Brussels.

Mr. Williams: This issue is important. I understand that the meeting with the American President took place after the debate last week in the House, so it is even more important to have a statement this week.

Mr. Biffen: As I have said, we can discuss the matter through the usual channels. However, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary would not take new policy initiatives with the American President. What he said to the House last week was a clear and definitive statement of the British position.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I declare an interest? The Leader of the House has just slipped in the suggestion that, if there is to be a statement, it could be on Friday morning. But on Friday morning I have an Adjournment debate on the Westland affair. Is the idea that my debate should be truncated in any way? After all, there is a great deal to be said about the Defence Committee——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that I can help the hon. Gentleman. I recall that his debate on the Westland affair will be held before 11 am. If by chance there is a statement, it will come after his debate.

Later—

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps inadvertently, your response to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on Friday's Adjournment debates gave me the impression that, if a statement were made on the Foreign Affairs Council, you would protect Adjournment debates prior to the statement. I and others have Adjournment debates that will take place after a possible statement and I trust that you will keep these in mind as well.

Mr. Speaker: Generally, I deprecate statements being made on a Friday because they intrude into Back Benchers' time; if they take place I normally adjust the timings of debates after 11 o'clock but not before. That is because statements on a Friday take place at 11 o'clock.

Members' Dining Facilities

4.56 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that an arrangement has been come to whereby the Members' Dining Room will be turned into the Strangers' Dining Room on an experimental basis at lunch time when the House returns from the summer recess, and that the existing Strangers' Dining Room will become the Members' Dining Room. I also understand that, if the experiment is considered to be successful, it will be extended, and the Members' Dining Room will be turned into the Strangers' Dining Room for dinner.

It is now becoming almost impossible for Members of Parliament to obtain tables in any of the facilities that should be available to them. What is happening to those facilities is nothing short of downright scandal. Hardly a day goes by without finding that it is impossible to have a buffet lunch in the Terrace Pavilion because the tables are almost entirely booked by those who are not Members of the House. The facilities that should be available to hon. Members are being increasingly encroached upon. In your capacity as Speaker, will you put that matter to the House for discussion and decision as a matter of urgency, and will you ensure that the experiment in the Members' Dining Room does not take place until the House has had a chance to discuss and decide on it?

Mr. Speaker: I understand that it was the unanimous recommendation of the Services Committee that the experiment should take place between October and Christmas, but if the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members are unhappy about it their most appropriate course might be to make their strong feelings known to members of that Committee.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that this matter comes before you as a recommendation and that it is for you to decide whether it is important enough to warrant putting it to the House. Would you consider putting it before the House, because——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has not got this matter quite right. It is perfectly true that the unanimous recommendation was brought to me. As it was unanimous, I inclined to agree to the experiment. If it does not work out, it will come to an end.

Mr. Willie W. Hamiliton (Fife, Central): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. From what you have said, do I take it that the Services Committee and you have executive authority to take such action without there being any prior debate in the House? If that is so, the House seems to have no control whatever. A cabal of Members called the Services Committee, in conjunction with you, have taken it upon themselves to take a decision that adversely affects the interests of the House as a whole. That seems manifestly wrong and I hope that this course is not pursued.

Mr. Speaker: The House sets up the Services Committee and charges it with making recommendations on the operation of the services of the House in the interests of the House. I do not think that the House would want every one of its decisions debated, but if the hon.

[Mr. Speaker]

Gentleman feels strongly about the issue—I sense that hon. Members do feel strongly — he should make representations to members of the Services Committee.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to delay the House, but this is an important matter for all hon. Members, especially those who use the Dining Room regularly. You have said, Mr. Speaker, that it would be for us to find a way of raising the matter. The Leader of the House is present. Perhaps he will be able to tell us from the Dispatch Box whether time can be made available to enable us to discuss the matter. It seems that we have no control over events. I must tell the Leader of the House that Members are already talking of taking their places in the Dining Room irrespective of whether the change takes place. That would embarrass members of the public and the House authorities.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Silly.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman may think that that is silly, but some of us wish to defend the rights of Back-Bench Members. The way that the hon. Gentleman is going, he will probably spend the whole of his parliamentary life on the Back Benches. Perhaps the Leader of the House will make a statement.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have noted the hon. Gentleman's remarks and the intensity of feeling that lies behind them. I suggest that it is an appropriate matter to put to me in my role as Leader of the House when I next announce the business.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it will help if I draw these exchanges to the attention of the Chairman of the Catering Committee.

BILL PRESENTED

Osteopaths

Mr. Roy Galley, supported by Sir Gerard Vaughan, Dame Jill Knight, Mr. Michael Brown, Mr. Nicholas Winterton, Mr. David Evennett, Mr. Christopher Murphy, Mr. Lewis Stevens and Mr. Kenneth Hind, presented a Bill to establish the existing general council and register of osteopaths as the statutory registering and governing body to unite and regulate the practice of osteopathy and certain other practitioners of manipulative therapy; to restrict the practice thereof by unqualified persons other than registered medical practitioners and State-registered physiotherapists and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 October and to be printed. [Bill 218.]

Companies (Disabled Employees Quota)

5.3 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for effective penalties to be applied to registered companies which fail to employ a specified quota of disabled persons.

During periods of severe economic depression, disabled persons are much more severely affected than others when it comes to getting a job. The latest data available shows that unemployment among disabled persons is double that of non-disabled persons. It is not necessary for that to be so, because there is legislation on the statute book to protect the interests of disabled people who wish to work. The Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944 did three important things. It defined the term "disabled persons", it established the voluntary register of disabled persons, and it outlined the form of an employment quota scheme.

The quota scheme provides that all employers with 20 or more employees have a statutory duty to employ a quota of registered disabled persons, but the Act did not fix the level of the quota. However, in 1946 it was agreed that it should be 3 per cent. of the payroll. Although the 1944 Act was not binding on the Crown, Government Departments and the National Health Service nevertheless agreed to accept the same responsibilities as other employers. I shall demonstrate that, regrettably, Government Departments are among the worst offenders against the 1944 Act.

One of the problems with the present system is that it is not an offence for an employer to be below the quota, but it is an offence for an employer to engage someone other than a registered disabled person when the employer is below quota. There is a means of opting out for employers, and that is by applying to the Manpower Services Commission for a permit. Permits are issued by the MSC when it is satisfied that no suitable registered disabled person or persons are available. Regrettably, the MSC appears to issue permits, nearly always in bulk, with the same flippancy as a guest showers confetti at a wedding. This hypocrisy must stop. The system is a shambles.

Fines can be imposed on employers. If a company is obliged to employ a quota of disabled persons, it must keep a record, and failure to do so results in a fine not exceeding £20. I am sure that a fine of that size does not worry an employer for a second.

A few examples will illustate the problem. The Banking, Insurance and Finance Union carried out a survey among 31 companies in the finance industry. Between them the 31 companies employ more than 250,000, and the survey showed that only 2,000 are disabled. That is not 3 per cent. but less than 1 per cent. That is a disgrace and an outrage. In reply to a question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) a Minister from the Department of Employment informed him that of the 35,481 firms subject to the provisions of the quota scheme, only 28 per cent. employed the full quota. A further 52·7 per cent. were below quota but had been issued with permits, and just about all of them were bulk permits.

That is unsatisfactory, and a number of questions must be asked. How many of the companies were checked? With what certainty can the MSC state that the companies were operating within the spirit of the law? How many of the 17,000 or 18,000 companies issued with bulk permits have abused them? Did the MSC do any follow-up checking? What about Government Departments? They might reasonably be expected to set a good example but, regrettably, the situation is hopeless.

At the latest date on which information is available, only one of 27 Government Departments is at quota level, and that is the National Savings Department. Of the rest, only five Departments have reached 2 per cent. or more, and four are employing less than 1 per cent. The Home Office has reached a miserly 0·5 per cent. and the Department of Health and Social Security has reached 1·4 per cent., which is less than half the quota level. It is shameful that the great Departments of State set such a bad example. Ministers should hang their heads in shame.

What happens to companies which break the law? The answer is nothing. Since 1944, only 10 companies have been to court on this issue and three of them escaped a fine. Those which were fined faced exceptionally small penalties. To counter this situation, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), who is now Minister for Trade, argued on 14 May 1985 at a meeting with the all-party disablement group that there were not enough registered disabled persons to allow employers to achieve the 3 per cent. quota, because not all disabled people choose to register.

When the 3 per cent. quota was determined in 1946, consideration was taken of the probability that not all disabled persons would register. Some disabled persons do not register because of the lack of incentive to do so, and for others registration is counter-productive. Such is the discrimination against those who have suffered certain illnesses — for example, against those who have experienced a period of mental illness or sufferers from epilepsy—that many people choose to keep quiet about their problems.

Since the 1950s, however, the number of disabled persons registering with local authorities has increased from less than 200,000 in 1956 to over 1 million. Over the same period there has been a decline in the number registering for employment purposes from over 1 million to 400,000. The decline is due to the lack of specific and real benefits as a result of registration. For those registering with local authorities there was immediate and tangible benefit, including car parking badges and bus tokens.

What should be done? Employers should be made to enforce the quota system. If disabled persons saw that efforts were being made to reach the 3 per cent. quota by private and public companies and Government Departments, there would be a greater incentive to register. Simultaneously, it would be easier for the MSC to take action against those employers not reaching the quota. The House should realise that 96 per cent. of all permits issued are bulk permits. There is an urgent need to stop the issue of these permits, as the present situation is no longer acceptable on either economic or moral grounds. There is a need for more inspectors to discover the companies which are infringing the present arrangements. There is a need for more prosecutions to be taken against companies flouting the law.

My Bill is aimed at giving disabled persons more opportunity to obtain work. It is also aimed at giving notice to employers subject to quota that, if there is no improvement, effective action will have to be taken against them, and that will be by the introduction of penalties that are large enough to make it extremely costly for an employer to ignore the quota. If doing so helps unemployed disabled persons to get jobs, it will be worthwhile.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Roland Boyes, Mr. Jack Ashley, Mr. Alfred Morris, Dr. David Clark, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Mark Fisher, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Tony Banks, Dr. Norman A. Godman, Mr. Jeff Rooker, Mr. David Clelland and Mr. Richard Caborn.

Companies (Disabled Employees Quota)

Mr. Roland Boyes accordingly presented a Bill to provide for effective penalties to be applied to registered companies which fail to employ a specified quota of disabled persons. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 24 October and to be printed. [Bill 219.]

Social Security Bill (Allocation of Time)

5.12 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move,

That the Order of the House [15th April] be supplemented as follows:

Lords Amendments

1. — (1) The proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting.

(2) The order in which the proceedings are taken shall be—

(a) the following Lords Amendments—
(i) 1 to 34;
(ii) 94 to 109;
(iii) 135 to 139;

(b) the following Lords Amendments—
(i) 35;
(ii) 42 to 44;
(iii) 36 to 39, 41, 45, 67, 119;

(c) the following Lords Amendments—
(i) 40;
(ii) 46 to 51 (including 48A);
(iii) 84 to 86;

(d) Lords Amendments 52 to 66, 68 to 83, 87 to 93, 110 to 118, 120 to 134 (including 121A), 140 to 184, and, subject to the provisions of the Order [15th April], each part of those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion not later than the end of such period beginning with the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order as is of the length specified in the second column of the Table set out below.

TABLE

Lords Amendments	Length of period from commencement of proceedings on Motion
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(a) above.	1 hour 15 mins
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(b) above.	2 hours
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(c) above.	3 hours
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(d) above.	4 hours

2.—(1) For the purposes of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—
(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment or, as the case may be, in their Amendment, as amended;
(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;
(iii) put forthwith with respect to the Amendments designated by Mr. Speaker which have not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendments; and
(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—
(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;
(ii) in the case of each remaining item designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Proposal; and
(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplement

5. — (1) In this paragraph "the proceedings" means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and on the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of any such Message or for the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a Member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

We have already spent a great deal of time debating the Bill. Up to now, a total of 224 hours have been spent in both Houses on the legislation. The Committee stage in this House alone took over 162 hours. If I may put the figure into context, the 224 hours spent on the Bill are already not far short of the 234 hours spent on four separate pieces of legislation between 1946 and 1948, which followed the Beveridge report. Therefore, more time has been spent on this social security legislation than on any other such legislation since the war.

I believe that the Bill has had a thorough examination, which has come on top of a period of consultation which began in November 1983. A total of 4,500 organisations and members of the public gave evidence in that period. Ministers held 19 public sessions to take formal evidence. In June last year we published a Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security" and in December a White Paper followed. Never before have a Government carried out such an extensive consultation exercise prior to introducing legislation.

Many of the amendments that are before the House are technical changes, which I do not think should delay us. I recognise, however, that a number of the amendments made in the other place raise important questions. The motion has been drafted in such a way as to enable debate on those issues.

In those circumstances, I hope that the House will agree that the terms of the motion are adequate for our consideration of the Lords amendments and that we can proceed to the final stages of this important Bill.

5.14 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): There is something rather distasteful about putting a four-hour limit on debates on dozens of amendments received from another place, especially when three of them are extremely contentious. There is something infinitely more distasteful about forcing the measure through when the nation is distracted by the festivities of the royal wedding. But what is perhaps most distasteful of all is that the Government's business managers have deliberately orchestrated this dirty business in order to combine on this day, which might be expected to reflect a spirit of magnanimity and national unity, the imposition of extra rates payments of £300 million for the poorest people on supplementary benefit and cuts in single payments so necessary to their livelihood of some £150 million to £200 million—a total of nearly £500 million of cuts for some of the poorest people in our society.

I believe that any reasonably objective person would acknowledge that four hours in which to debate the amendments is absurdly inadequate. Indeed, it is not even four hours when one excludes the time spent protesting at the guillotine, which protest we are keeping short, but which is certainly necessary. When one excludes the time for votes, debating time is probably down to only two and a half hours. This is a charade when one bears it in mind that these are not some peripheral changes. Major modifications were made to the Bill in another place which have altered its structure and left it fundamentally flawed.

There has been forced retreat from the 2 per cent. personal pensions bribe; forced retreat on the payment of family credit to the father; forced retreat on the state-earnings related pension scheme; inclusion of community care additions for the disabled that the Government never intended; forced retreat on benefits for child minders; retreat on fares for the unemployed who do voluntary work; reversal of the Government's plans to force people, after emergencies or disasters, to apply to a discretionary social fund; defeat over the right to independent appeal from refusals of help under the social fund; and, of course, defeat over the imposition of the iniquitous 20 per cent. rates payment. After all that, the original structure and logic of the Bill are altered beyond recognition, and to allow a mere two and a half hours to debate what is now a largely rehashed Bill is, frankly, a travesty of parliamentary procedure.

That is the main ground on which we protest at the timetabling limit, but there are some others. Amendments from the other place made to other Bills are not being guillotined. Why should this Bill be singled out for such a restriction on debate? Indeed, if there is such a limit on time, how is it that three other major items of business are being taken afterwards? The fact is that the Government are gratuitously signalling their contempt for Parliament by putting a four-hour time limit on extremely contentious social security business, then putting on social security regulations that are also contentious, and following that with amendments from another place to three further Bills.

Another reason why we object to the guillotine is that the only relatively free—I say that as a term of art—and open voting on the Bill, free of the Whipping juggernaut in this House, has been in another place. After that led to such major structural changes in the Bill, it seems particularly offensive to use a 140 Whipped majority in this House to steamroller out all those changes within a debating period of two and a half hours, which is nothing more than an insult to the democratic process.

More specifically, we object because in all three of the main issues being debated today it is not simply a straightforward amendment in another place that is being reversed. In every case the thrust of the amendment made in another place is to be reversed, but in a manner which is not straightforward and which introduces several fresh complications.

On the 20 per cent. rates payment, the Government argue that the amendment from the other place is technically defective, but their own proposal goes far beyond reversing any technical defect and introduces several new questions which need adequate debating time. On the community care additions, the Government have, under the guise of tidying up a loosely drawn amendment, severely restricted the range of the proposal made in another place and have left open major new questions about who should or should not be covered. An entirely new concept is being introduced in the Bill, which it is ludicrous to restrict to a debate lasting three quarters of an hour to an hour.

On the question of independent appeals from social fund decisions, I should like to draw to the attention of the House the fact that since the issue was last debated in the House the European Court has ruled in two cases—one from Holland and one from Germany — that social security can be regarded as a civil right, and that under the European Convention on Human Rights there has to be an independent judicial element in social security disputes. That is very relevant. To restrict debate on this important matter to less than one hour in the light of the latest development from the European Court is, I repeat, a travesty of parliamentary procedure.

It is obvious that the Government have an obsessive determination to push through the reversal of these amendments with what I can only describe as indecent haste. The Government were even prepared in the early hours of this morning to sacrifice the Education Bill and to lose that important measure until October or November in order to get this Bill through at any cost in the next few days. I can explain why the Government are doing this. They are doing it because the Bill imposes cuts of £1,000 million on some of the most vulnerable people in society.

For those reasons, the Opposition strongly reject this unnecessary and offensive timetable motion. However, we do not propose to vote against it, not because of a lack of feeling on our part, but because of the way in which the Government have rigged the four hours of debate. It would take a further 15 minutes out of the debate if we were to divide and that would cut in on what is already less than minimal debating time. Our decision not to divide the House on the motion must not be seen as silent approval of the guillotine. Quite the reverse is true. We strongly condemn and castigate the motion as unnecessary and offensive.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I do not wish to detain the House for any longer than the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) did. However, it is important to reinforce some of the points that he made.

The Secretary of State is pushing the position beyond the limits of reasonableness by presenting us with more than 100 amendments to consider this evening. I have tried to count the amendments, but the problem is that many of them are grouped on the selection list in the form, "Nos. 84 to 86". At first sight the position does not seem to be too bad, but if one adds them up one finds that there are dozens and dozens of amendments. I remind the House that the Report stage in the House of Lords finished only this week.

The Secretary of State guillotined the Committee proceedings in a way which inevitably meant that many of the issues were not properly discussed. That inevitably resulted in the Government having to amend the Bill in the House of Lords. I have studied the House of Lords Committee proceedings and the Report proceedings very carefully. It is clear, especially in the pensions provisions, that the Government's proposals were so ill-digested that it was inevitable—and the Secretary of State and his advisers must have realised—that the Lords would be required to insert many technical amendments and tidying up provisions of the Government's own making.

It is right for the House to protest in the strongest possible terms, if only in an attempt to influence Parliament in future and stop it from engaging in a legislative programme which inevitably puts the House in an impossible position when considering technical details, especially in relation to pension provisions.

I completely agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West. The three other substantive debates this evening are of a political nature. The Government must have known that a great deal of time would be necessary to deal with these technical amendments, and I object more to the lack of time to deal with them than I do to the scant time that is provided for the political debates on these extremely important matters.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the arguments that have taken place over the past week about the funding of the various social security programmes of political parties. How much does the alliance intend to spend on its social security programme? Can he provide us with a figure? During the course of these debates the alliance will climb on to Labour's argument in the country about the nature of the Government's social security proposals——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I find it very difficult to relate this intervention to the allocation of time motion.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am grateful for your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) will have to wait and see. If I followed him down that avenue, I would inevitably be out of order.

The Secretary of State must accept the point made by myself and others in Committee. We said that the Bill was a mistake. The right hon. Gentleman should have introduced two or three Bills. If he had done that, the parliamentary process in both Houses would have been more sensible and would have given hon. Members a better chance to scrutinise the measures properly.

5.25 pm

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Listening to some Opposition Members one would imagine that a guillotine had never been imposed before at any time at any stage on any Bill. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) repeated himself about six times. Although I was not a member of the Committee, there were more than 160 hours of debate——

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): The hon. Lady was not there.

Dame Jill Knight: I was not on the Committee of this Bill.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Lady was not here either.

Dame Jill Knight: If the hon. Lady wants to make a speech later, she will no doubt be able to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, she must learn not to shout from a sedentary position when other hon. Members are trying to make their points.

Every hon. Member with any experience of these matters knows perfectly well that, unless a guillotine is imposed, the Bill will never get through the House. We all know of the ability of Members to make very long speeches to block the passage of Government business. In this instance the guillotine is perfectly reasonable and sensible. I strongly support it.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): I find it especially offensive on this day of all days for Her Majesty's Government to come to the House an hour or two after witnessing the vulgar rich outside engaging in a spree which will cost the taxpayer we do not know what, and state that there will be two hours to debate the clobbering of the poor, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, to the extent of at least £300 million.

Today's copy of The Guardian contains an article about the Child Poverty Action Group. The CPAG plans to run a campaign about what the Government have been up to since 1979. The article states:

> "The top 2 per cent. of taxpayers (earning £30,000-plus a year) are £2 billion better off this year as a result of tax cuts since 1979."

The article goes on to state that the poor are worse off by precisely the same amount. The Bill is part of that exercise.

However the Government wrap this up, they are suppressing debate on a matter about which the Opposition feel very strongly. They are trying to compress debate into one or two hours, because they think that events outside will take precedence in the press over their dirty work today. That is the purpose of today's exercise and that has been the purpose of the exercise since 1979. If the Government were in the dock, by God the whole lot of them would be in Brixton prison tomorrow.

5.29 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): As one who was not privileged to participate in the Committee stage, I am astounded at the synthetic anger of the Opposition. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, there has been more debate on this Bill than on any other measure since the war. My right hon. Friend has explained how the Government's commitment to a thoroughgoing and overdue reform of the social security system has been dealt with in the greatest possible detail both in the Chamber and in Committee.

I am sure that all my hon. Friends are astounded that the Opposition wish so slavishly to adhere to amendments made in another place that they do not want them dealt with as proposed in the timetable motion. I am equally astounded that the Opposition are spending so much time on nonsensical argument about the timetable motion that there will be even less time to debate the substantive issues. I wonder how they will square that with their constituents, having given up the time that we wished to devote to debating the substance of the Bill and wasted it on all this nonsense about the timetable.

For all those reasons, I hope that we can now get on and approve the motion.

5.30 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I think that I am the first Back-Bench spokesman who was a member of the Committee, which is a reflection in itself. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) said that we had plenty of time in Committee. In fact, after the guillotine was introduced, the Government put down about 50 amendments, taking up a great deal of the remaining time.

The reason for the Government's timing is obvious. It is because the eyes of people in this country and the world, for reasons best known to themselves, are marvelling at the event which has taken place today. Whether that is good or bad is a matter of opinion. What is appalling is that the Government should use this day to rob deprived people who have to pay their rents and bills and will be going to the social security offices tomorrow.

The Government have brought in a guillotine because the Bill cannot stand the light of examination, morally or otherwise. There is no justification whatever for this measure. It takes away the rights of the poor in relation to community care, the 20 per cent. rate contribution and the right of appeal.

Many years ago I read a book by a Christian priest entitled "The Confessions of an Ecclesiastical Coward", or something to that effect. He talked about rich and poor and the obscenity of the ring on the bishop's finger when people were dying of starvation. The Bill before us is an obscenity and should be thrown out immediately.

5.32 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Yesterday, the Tory Benches were packed, mainly by those who wished to retain corporal punishment. They are showing much less concern today. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are all the Labour Members?"] We did not introduce the Bill.

If the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) does not understand why we are protesting, I will explain. The Bill is a further onslaught on the poorest members of the community. We believe that it is wrong that those whom we seek to protect should be subject to this kind of action from the Government and that we shall not have enough time to make our arguments.

The Report stage was also guillotined, and many issues that should have been debated were not discussed at all while other important issues received insufficient debate.

Any Conservative Member who thinks that our concern is not genuine should appreciate that when we talk about the poorest members of the community we refer not to a generalised problem but to many of our own constituents. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), answered a parliamentary question from me about the percentage increase in the number of people of working age — I stress that aspect — receiving supplementary benefit in the west midlands, the black country and my own borough, Walsall, since May 1979. The number in Walsall in 1979 was 6,381. The latest figure, given in the Minister's reply to me, is 20,743. In the black country, the figure has risen from 26,500 in May 1979 to 94,000 today.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): I do not wish to detract at all from the seriousness of that situation, save to make one point that the hon. Gentleman would no doubt wish to have on record. The increase in the value of supplementary benefit automatically increases the figures. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear that in mind before drawing too many conclusions from those figures.

Mr. Winnick: I have never heard such a threadbare argument, even from a Tory Minister. The figures show that many more of our constituents are now living in poverty as a result of Government policy. The increase in my borough in seven years of Conservative government has been 225 per cent. In the black country which takes in my borough, Dudley, Sandwell and Wolverhampton, the increase has been more than 255 per cent. Those daunting figures illustrate the poverty and devastation caused by the Government. That is why we want sufficient time to debate amendments and clauses of crucial importance to our constituents.

If the Lords amendments are rejected, the lives of the people whom I have described will be made even more difficult as a result of Government policy. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is absolutely right to protest extremely strongly about the further guillotine proposal before us today.

5.37 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I shall not detain the House long as we want to get on with the substantive debates. Nevertheless, it should be on record for the benefit of members of the other place that we have not had time to consider their proposed changes in detail.

It is ridiculous for the Government to talk about the hours of debate in Committee when we have before us 184 amendments from another place which this House has not yet had the opportunity to address at all as well as amendments tabled by the Government yesterday, which have appeared on the Amendment Paper today, dealing with matters of great importance, yet the Opposition have had no opportunity to put down amendments to those proposals.

[Mr. Dafydd Wigley]

We have four hours to deal with 30 pages of minute detail, which gives us an average of one minute per amendment. Is that how the Government intend to pass social security legislation? If the Bill goes back to the other place tomorrow after the rejection of the Lords' proposals, they should know that we have not had time to divide the House on all the issues that we wished. I hope that the Lords will insist on their amendments, because we shall not have had time to do justice to their arguments or to the people affected by the proposals.

5.39 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I emphasise the points made by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and make one further point in opposing the guillotine.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) said that we had had a record amount of time to consider the Bill. Technically, she is right to refer to it as one Bill but a moment's consideration shows that it is really not one but five major Bills. We have had great difficulty securing sufficient time to debate all the issues involved, either in the Chamber or in Committee.

Like many other hon. Members, the hon. Member for Edgbaston knows that some of the proposals in what is being presented as a single Bill are contentious, to put it mildly. We are aware that the Government got many of them through by using the Whips. When they were taken to another place, however, the Government found it much more difficult to win the argument. As the hon. Member for Caernarfon said, we are supposed to examine the amendments at a rate of one a minute. The Government, far from giving us a free debate, will enforce their will by pushing through the guillotine motion.

As we debate the amendments, one crucial fact will form the backcloth. Many parts of the Bill will disadvantage many of our constituents. We must also remember that, since 1979, the richest 90,000 taxpayers have picked up an average of £12,750 in tax cuts whereas the poorest, who earn less than £5,000 a year, have gained an average of £55. Those are the Government's priorities, and it is those priorities, as they appear in the Bill, which we wish to oppose.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I do not wish to detain the House, but I have a special reason for not wanting there to be a guillotine.

It is about time that we were given an opportunity to press the alliance for more information. I do not know whether hon. Members are aware of it, but the alliance is telling people that it intends to raise the level of benefits while, in Conservative-held constituencies which it is setting out to win at the next general election, it is not admitting that it intends to raise taxes. There is a dubious tone to the campaign that it is running. It is important that the alliance is pressed on these matters so that people who intend to vote for it are aware of the implications of their decision.

When people vote Labour, they know that we intend to raise taxes. We have been open and clear about that. It is part of the just arrangements which we say should prevail. The same cannot be said of the alliance. We should be able to press spokesmen for the alliance on every amendment to establish their real policy. It is unreasonable for a political party to talk of increasing provision but to refuse to acknowledge where it will raise the money required.

Some months ago, during Prime Minister's Question Time, I put it to the Prime Minister, from a sedentary position, that she did not care. I never believed that that intervention would catch as much as it did among Conservative Back Benchers. It caught because they knew that it was true. They know what their supporters in the country are saying.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The Queen does not like it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend is right. The editor of The Sunday Times advises us that his sources are impeccable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must stick to the allocation of time motion.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I was speaking absolutely to order because I believe that there are hundreds of Conservative Back Benchers who are desperate to speak up on these matters, and there will not be time. They know that they have a duty to the House and their constituents to bring to the House's attention the anxieties that are being expressed by their constituents. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) shakes his head. Is he saying that there are not Conservatives, and thousands of them, in Mid-Worcestershire — I hope that I am reported on his local radio station — who are saying, when they gather socially and at political meetings——

Mr. Forth: They never mention it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: —that the Government are being insensitive to the needs of the unemployed?

Mr. Forth: They do not say that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is he saying that his local Conservatives are turning their backs on people in need?

Mr. Forth: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is he saying that they are not saying that the Government are turning their back on people in need and are refusing to accept that they should make greater provision? The hon. Gentleman does not care because he does not understand what local Conservatives are saying. He does not understand their worries. Every right hon. and hon. Member is being subjected to the same pressures. Conservative Members know that that is true, because they tell my hon. Friends so privately.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport) rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: We do not have to catch them in the net in the House — we have millions in the country. They all know the truth, and they should go to Ministers privately and tell them what they are being told. What Conservative Back Benchers are doing is immoral. There is no justification for it. There are many people who believe in one-nation Conservatism and who object to what is going on and say, "Stop it." Why does the Secretary of State not stop it?

5.46 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is right to spend a few minutes debating the timetable motion because it goes to the heart of everything that the Government are trying to do with the Bill. The Bill affects more people than any other legislation that has been passed during the past seven years—it affects the old, the young, the sick, the poor, the out-of-work and people in work. It even affects schoolchildren who will today lose their right to a free school meal because of the votes of Conservative Members.

Consideration of the Bill is to be timetabled because the Government do not want public debate of the matter. It is being timetabled today because they hope that people will be befuddled by the royal wedding and not learn in the newspapers what the Bill really means.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I am getting a little worried by some of my hon. Friends' references to events that have taken place outwith this place today. Is my hon. Friend aware that, in the Department of Health and Social Security parlance, a certain young naval officer will, from today, receive an additional requirement—not a single payment—of some £30,000 a year?

Mr. Corbyn: I hope that he does not——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does he need it?

Mr. Corbyn: —ever have to claim social security, because he would have difficulty living on it. His £30,000 is more than many families get over several years. The money that he is getting would keep an awful lot of people for a long time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I realise that the hon. Gentleman was tempted, but he must speak to the motion.

Mr. Corbyn: The motion is perfectly simple. The House is being gagged by a Tory majority because they do not want public debate on the most vicious piece of social legislation to be introduced by any Tory Government since the days of Neville Chamberlain. We shall oppose it. We will probably be defeated by the willing herd of sycophants behind the Minister, but we shall defeat them in a general election and change the legislation.

5.48 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): The sooner that this courageous Bill to simplify and modernise the social security system reaches the statute book, the better. No Bill has been better debated inside the House and outside it since I was elected. Every beneficiary group is represented professionally. We have been inundated with correspondence and information. We know very well what the Bill is about and the sooner it reaches the statute book the better.

As for the charge that the Conservative party does not care for the unemployed, I find that the major complaint in my surgeries from the unemployed is that it is not worth while going out to work. That is one thing which the Bill tries to remedy, and the sooner it is done, the better.

5.49 pm

Dr. Norman Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I wish to voice my dismay and concern at the guillotine on this Bill.

Poverty is not distributed evenly throughout Great Britain. Strathclyde region in Scotland is acknowledged by the European Commission as one of the most deprived regions in the European Community. In my constituency, more than 40 per cent. of those whom I represent, about 33,000 people, live on or below supplementary benefit level. I protest most strongly on their behalf at the way in which the Government have treated the Bill and deliberations on it by introducing this guillotine motion.

Tory Members claim that the Government are a caring, compassionate Administration. If that is so, why is a large part of the electorate outside the deep south so hostile to the Tory party? [Interruption.]

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can we be assured that Hansard has recorded the remarks of the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer)?

5.50 pm

Mr. Fowler: I shall respond briefly to the debate. I heard with mounting disbelief what the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and many of his hon. Friends were saying. It is almost exactly 10 years since the day, in July 1976, when the Labour Government imposed, not one guillotine, but five guillotines in one day. This is the 10th anniversary of that action by the Labour Government. The Health Service Bill was guillotined that day and it had started its Committee stage only four weeks previously. The Minister in charge of the Education Bill was none other than the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett).

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Secretary of State tell us in how many of those cases the content of the Bill was debated within the same timetable motion?

Mr. F[illegible]: My point is that there was no precedent for the five guillotine motions imposed that day, and the hon. Lady knows that that is the case.

The Government are simply not prepared to take lectures on imposing guillotines from the Labour party. When the hon. Member for Oldham, West poses as a defender of the House of Lords, this debate has reached an extraordinary stage. We have taken 224 hours to debate this social security legislation. We have taken 163 hours in Committee. That is longer than on any other social security legislation since the war, and it is certainly much longer than on any other social security legislation which was introduced by the Labour Government.

I must say to the hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) that many of the amendments are, as they well know, technical changes which should not delay the House greatly. I recognise that some amendments made in the other place raise important questions, and the motion before the House has been drafted in such a way as to enable debate on those issues to take place. I suggest that that debate now takes place.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Order of the House [15th April] be supplemented as follows:

1.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting.

(2) The order in which the proceedings are taken shall be—

(a) the following Lords Amendments—

(i) 1 to 34;

(ii) 94 to 109;

(iii) 135 to 139;

(b) the following Lords Amendments—

(i) 35;

(ii) 42 to 44;

[Mr. Fowler]

(iii) 36 to 39, 41, 45, 67, 119;

(c) the following Lords Amendments—

(i) 40;

(ii) 46 to 51 (including 48A);

(iii) 84 to 86;

(d) Lords Amendments 52 to 66, 68 to 83, 87 to 93, 110 to 118, 120 to 134 (including 121A), 140 to 184, and, subject to the provisions of the Order [15th April], each part of those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion not later than the end of such period beginning with the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order as is of the length specified in the second column of the Table set out below.

TABLE

Lords Amendments	Length of period from commencement of proceedings on Motion
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(a) above.	1 hour 15 mins
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(b) above.	2 hours
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(c) above.	3 hours
Amendments up to the end of those listed in sub-paragraph (2)(d) above.	4 hours

2.—(1) For the purposes of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment or, as the case may be, in their Amendment, as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to the Amendments designated by Mr. Speaker which have not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendments; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of each remaining item designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Proposal; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplement

5. — (1) In this paragraph "the proceedings" means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and on the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of any such Message or for the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a Member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

Orders of the Day

Social Security Bill

Lords amendments considered

Clause 1

MINIMUM CONTRIBUTIONS TO PERSONAL PENSION SCHEMES.

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 8, at beginning insert

"Subject to subsection (3A) below,".

5.53 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments:

No. 2, in page 2, line 10, at end insert—

"(3A) In such circumstances as may be prescribed the Secretary of State shall pay minimum contributions to a prescribed person."

No. 4, in clause 3, page 4, line 13, at beginning insert

"Subject to subsection (1A) below,".

No. 5, page 4, line 27, at end insert—

"(1A) In relation to earnings paid with respect to any such employment as may be prescribed, subsection (1) above shall have effect as if the words 'the aggregate of' and paragraph (b) and the word 'and' immediately preceding it were omitted."

No. 6, in clause 4, page 5, line 20, after "earner" insert "sections 16(2B), 28(7A) and 59(1A) of the Social Security Act 1975 and".

No. 7, in clause 5, page 6, line 22, at end insert—

"section 52C of or paragraph 16 of".

No. 8, page 6, line 41, after "29" insert "(2) and".

No. 9, page 6, line 43, leave out from beginning to "were" at page 7, line 7, and insert—

"to that person and a widow or widower of that person as if any guaranteed minimum pension to which that person or any such widow or widower is treated as entitled under those provisions, and which derives from the minimum contributions, minimum payments (within the meaning of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975) or transfer payment or payments from which those rights derive".

No. 10, page 7, line 26, leave out from "pension" to end of line 27 and insert—

"such as is mentioned in subsection (9) above."

No. 94, in schedule 1, page 88, line 15, leave out "or" and insert—

"pension scheme or protected rights (within the meaning of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975) under an".

No. 95, page 88, line 20, at beginning insert "The value of".

No. 96, page 88, line 23, after "which" insert "the value of".

No. 97, page 89, line 15, leave out sub-paragraph (3) and insert—

"(3) Effect may be given to protected rights by the provision of a lump sum if—

(a) the lump sum is payable on a date which is either the date on which the member attains pensionable age or such later date as has been agreed by him; and

(b) the annual rate of a pension under sub-paragraph (1) above or an annuity under sub-paragraph (2) above giving effect to the protected rights and commencing on the date on which the lump sum is payable would not exceed the prescribed amount; and

(c) the circumstances are such as may be prescribed; and

(d) the amount of the lump sum is calculated in a manner satisfactory to the Occupational Pensions Board by reference to the amount of the pension or annuity."

No. 98, page 89, line 46, after "amount" insert—

"and the circumstances are such as may be prescribed,"

No. 99, page 90, line 17, leave out from "with" to end of line 46 and insert—

"any such requirements as may be prescribed for meeting the whole or a prescribed part of any liability in respect of protected rights under the scheme which the scheme is unable to meet from its own resources—

(a) by reason of the commission by any person of a criminal offence;

(b) in such other circumstances as may be prescribed."

I inform the House that Lords amendments Nos. 1 and 2 involve privilege.

Mr. Major: Many of these amendments are drafting or technical changes to ensure that the Bill works as intended. [Interruption.] However, a small number of amendments deserve particular, but brief, mention, even at the risk of having to speak over the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Amendments Nos. 4 and 5 enable regulations to be made excluding some people from entitlement to the 2 per cent. incentive addition to the payment which DHSS Newcastle will make to their personal pensions. That is for a five-year period until April 1993, and it is in addition to the normal contracted-out rebate.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State undertook to do when the Bill was last considered by the House, we have listened carefully to representations about this incentive payment, particularly to the proposition that it should not go to people who have been in contracted-out occupational schemes. While we remain unpersuaded by the predictions of dire consequences for occupational schemes if this modest inducement were to remain available, we certainly do not doubt or question the sincerity of those who find this an issue of principle. After careful consideration, not forced retreat, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) claimed earlier, we have decided to make these amendments. The principle we are accepting is that the 2 per cent. incentive will not be available to people who have belonged to a contracted-out occupational scheme for a reasonable period and who then leave it voluntarily.

What is a reasonable period? No decision has yet been taken about that, primarily because we wish to listen carefully to the views put to us. The proposals for the regulations will be subject to full public consultation later this year, and I hope that the House will welcome that.

Of less importance, but worth mentioning, are amendments Nos. 1 and 2 which give power to allow outstanding payments from DHSS Newcastle to be made to a scheme or insurer to which a person's pension savings have been transferred. Without these amendments we would occasionally have faced the absurd situation of those payments having effectively no proper home to go to because the person had taken his or her accumulated pension rights elsewhere. The provision commits the contracted-out rebate effectively to follow the pension savings.

[Mr. Major]

Finally, amendment No. 99 replaces paragraph 10 of schedule 1 with a specifically worded power. On reflection, and in the light of advice from some pensions experts, paragraph 10 did not do what we intended it to do. The amendment ensures that there is power to make regulations about the arrangements that a personal pension scheme must make to compensate members if it cannot meet its liabilities because of fraud, theft or negligence. My right hon. Friend invited the Occupational Pensions Board earlier this year to advise on compensation arrangements for personal pensions. We have just received its advice and will consider it carefully, with the other Departments concerned, before publishing consultative proposals later this year. That is in line with our intentions originally set out in the social security White Paper. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): One of the reasons why we have argued that the time for debate on the Bill has been inadequate has just been made plain by the Minister. It is more than ever apparent that in this House, in the other place and again in this House the Government are making up the Bill as they go along. Every time the Government announce some fresh changes, there is buried within them the words that the Government have yet to make up their mind or that they do not know exactly what the change means but sooner or later, in the fullness of time, all will be revealed. Tonight we are being asked to put on the statute book a Bill, many of the details of which remain unclear and will be settled in future.

Despite the changes that the Government have made on the 2 per cent. bribe, we remain of the view that personal pensions are likely to leave many people with wholly inadequate pension provision for their retirement which will inevitably mean that in future many more pensioners will be dependent on the equivalent of supplementary benefit. We remain even more strongly of the view that to offer people a 2 per cent. bribe to encourage them to run the risk of poverty in old age is morally indefensible, and, despite the Minister's concessions, may damage good occupational pension schemes. We shall terminate this bribe at the earliest possible moment after the general election. I do not intend to detain the House further on these amendments.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Amendment Nos. 4 and 5 attempt to limit the substantial move towards personal pensions that is generally expected when the regulations are published and come into effect. As a proponent of personal pensions for some time, I must admit that I welcome the amendment through slightly gritted teeth. That is not to say that the occupational pensions industry, which pushed hard for the amendment, has anything to be ashamed of. I pay tribute to the work that the industry has done over many years in building up occupational pensions to the extent that the freedom of personal pensions can take off from the ground work that it has laid. It has little to fear, in the growth of occupational pensions, from the fact that personal pensions will grow also. Nevertheless, personal pensions will grow slightly less slowly if the amendment is passed.

The amendment leaves the Secretary of State with the duty, ultimately, of regulating the time within which a member of an occupational scheme must decide whether or not to leave that scheme and to take out his own scheme. I press my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), to allow a considerable time to pass before he closes the door. Until the advent of the Bill, many occupational pension schemes were compulsory. Therefore, many people in occupational pension schemes will want to consider whether to opt out of those schemes and take out a personal pension.

That consideration will not be taken lightly or quickly. Very few people in occupational pension schemes have studied their schemes to the extent that they can say, off the top of their heads, whether the life cover in the scheme is adequate or whether it is below what is available on the market. Very few people can say whether the accrual rate on investments in the fund compares adequately with alternative accrual rates available elsewhere, or whether —this will be regulated by the Financial Services Bill— the charges levied by the managers of the schemes, especially in the early years, are comparable with those available in other schemes.

As a result of the publicity that will be generated by the passage of the legislation, many people will consider whether to move out of occupational schemes. I believe that in the majority of cases they will decide to stay in their present schemes. It will take a long time to get all the information together and to obtain adequate comparisons.

My comments are even more true of someone joining an occupational scheme after the legislation is effected, when the incentive is available. He will need a considerable amount of time to decide on the financial options. Once that decision has been made, further time will be necessary, in many cases, for the individual pension contributor to negotiate with his employer as to whether the employer will be prepared to make a corporate contribution to his individual pension scheme. All that will take time. Mechanisms must be developed, within the period in which the 2 per cent. incentive is available, to enable that to take place.

When my hon. Friend considers, as a result of consultation, what length of time to allow a pensioner, who may be a compulsory member of a pension scheme — he never had a choice in the matter because he wanted to keep his job — to decide whether or not to take the freedom offered, for the first time, as a result of the Bill, I hope that he will err on the side of generosity. I should have thought that a period of five years was by no means unreasonable.

My hon. Friend is to consult all relevant interests to decide on the time limit. He should not limit his consultations to representatives of existing pension schemes and existing pension scheme providers. As was noted in Standing Committee in a brief debate, to which both the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and I contributed, there is in existence a sort of pensions ombudsman. Although limited in scope, that office is doing useful work. I share the hope of the hon. Lady that the work of that or a similar office will be extended in the future.

That office has considerable experience of what one might call the unsatisfactory occupational pension schemes, about which a contributor who might consider leaving his existing scheme could require advice. I hope that in consulting on such schemes my hon. Friend will consider the experience of people who have complained to that ombudsman and ensure that he allows an adequate time limit.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I had some difficulty in trying to disentangle the import of amendments Nos. 4 and 5. I was assisted to some extent by the debate that took place in the other place. I welcome the amendment so far as it goes. It would be churlish of me to do otherwise. I raised the point in Committee and it was raised by Lord Banks in the other place.

It is important to recognise that the Government are assuming a wide power. I ask whether the wide powers that will be assumed by the Government will be used to exclude the 2 per cent. incentive for anyone who, after a "reasonable" period as a member of a contracted-out occupational scheme, decides of his own volition to leave it in favour of an "appropriate" personal pension. If that is the clear intention of the amendment, I support it and endorse what the Government are doing.

The definition of the word "reasonable" in that context should be relatively short. I draw the Government's attention to a possible comparison in length with the cooling off period required under the Financial Services Bill. As the Minister is probably aware, that is intended to cover those who join a contracted-out scheme but regret the decision and change their minds. That is the reasonable period that we would have in mind as a sensible way to proceed. If the word "reasonable" is interpreted in the regulations as longer than that, my enthusiasm for the change would quickly wane.

Because of the wide-ranging nature of the power, I seek an assurance from the Minister that there will be the fullest possible consultation with the industry and other interested parties before introducing the regulations, which will be extremely important to the way that the schemes work. That is a minimum requirement for my continued support of the amendment.

The hon. Member for Derby, South maintains the use of the pejorative word "bribe" in relation to the 2 per cent., but I am prepared to start considering it more in terms of an incentive than a bribe.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I wish to speak only briefly because the House knows that I have serious reservations about the principle and many of the details of the Bill. As the Bill stands, it contains provisions that will have serious disadvantages for a large number of my constituents in Kensington where many poor families have to pay exceptionally high rents and rates. They, in particular, stand to suffer from the Bill if it is passed in the form that seems likely.

I pay tribute to Ministers who have listened to our debates and made many important improvements in Standing Committee and in another place. I thank especially my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), in respect of the 2 per cent. "inducement", or whatever word one might wish to use, which was originally intended to lure pension scheme members away from occupational pension schemes to private provisions.

I listened carefully to the comments of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and am glad that he has taken on board the criticisms made in Parliament and outside on this subject. No final decisions have yet been taken on the 2 per cent. inducement. I hope that, in the further discussions on this point, the Government will take account of the fact that contributions to the private sector schemes are not enough, even for the long stayers, and need to be very much increased, but not by a little manoeuvre of this kind.

Early leavers and personal pension scheme members get a still worse deal than those who belong to group schemes as long stayers. This 2 per cent. subsidy from the taxpayer to encourage members to leave collective schemes is an ungainly and unwarranted intervention in the working of the capital market which will persist until April 1993. It would be better to withdraw the proposal altogether. I hope that that will be the Government's conclusion by the end of their deliberations.

It would be far better to induce the Treasury to regard the employer's entire national insurance contributions as the employee's deferred pay. That would significantly help to lift private sector pensioners from dependence on supplementary benefit. At the moment, the money flowing into occupational schemes in the private sector is not enough to do that. The problems of the millions of people on supplementary benefit in retirement is, I am afraid, likely to remain with us as the Bill stands. The Bill's object should be to reduce dramatically the number of people dependent on means-tested benefit through case work. I am afraid that, as the Bill stands, it will only add to their number.

Mr. Major: With the leave of the House, I shall reply briefly to some of the points that have been raised.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) and to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) for their welcome of amendments Nos. 4 and 5. I note the cautionary words implicit in the remarks of those hon. Members about the definition of the word "reasonable" and the conclusion of the consultation period. I assure the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) that we shall consult widely before laying the regulations on the 2 per cent. incentive. We plan to publish a consultation document later this year and to consider representations before publishing the regulations. I shall take careful note of the other important points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) rather uncharitably accused us of making up the Bill as we went along. I simply remind her that we are at present responding to representations made, not least by the Opposition, and I had hoped that the hon. Lady would welcome that. I remind the hon. Lady, who is clearly concerned about the number of regulations that spin off from this legislation, that it is in the nature of pensions legislation—both this and prior legislation—that many matters are best left to regulations. There is nothing novel in that concept.

The hon. Member for Derby, South said that she and her hon. Friends, if given the opportunity — which I think is unlikely — would remove the 2 per cent. incentive as soon as possible. She did not define what was meant by "as soon as possible". She did not on this or on previous occasions answer the question whether the Labour party would take similar action with the remainder of the contracted-out rebate. I hope that at some stage Labour Members will make clear their position. I hope that the amendments will be approved.

Clause 2

APPROPRIATE SCHEMES

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 4, line 12, at end insert—

"under section 41 of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980"

6.15 pm

Mr. Major: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 32, in clause 16, page 20, line 30, at end insert—

"(aa) the Sheriffs' Pensions (Scotland) Act 1961;"

Mr. Major: I am assured by my colleagues in the Scottish Office that these two technical amendments are necessary so that the provisions of the Social Security Bill sit happily with existing regulations. I am happy to take their advice, and I trust that the House will do so also.

No. 107, in line 3, leave out from beginning to "were" in line 13 and insert.

"to that person and a widow or widower of that person as if any guaranteed minimum pension to which that person or any such widow or widower is treated as entitled under those provisions, and which derives from the minimum payments, minimum contributions (within the meaning of the Social Security Act 1986) or transfer payment or payments from which those rights derive"

No. 108, in page 96, line 37, leave out from "pension" to end of line 39 and insert—

"such as is mentioned in subsection (8) above."

No. 109, in page 98, line 11, leave out

"after the definition of 'accrued rights'"

and insert

"before the definition of 'guaranteed minimum pension'".

I inform the House that amendment No. 11 involves privilege.

Mr. Major: Many of these amendments make drafting or technical changes. One that perhaps deserves particular mention is amendment No. 16 to clause 9. Apart from making some minor drafting changes, this provides for an exception, but only in the first year following payment of a guaranteed minimum pension, to the general rule that an increase in that GMP may not be provided out of any other part of the person's benefits due under the scheme. This relaxation will effectively simplify the administration of schemes which increase pensions other than at the beginning of a tax year and will mean that they will not have to provide two separate pension increases in the first year.

Amendments Nos. 17 to 20 are technical amendments to protect pensioners. They ensure that, where an occupational pension scheme takes advantage of provisions which allow an increase in the occupational pension to count towards an increase in the GMP, the pensioner does not overall receive less than the required annual increase in the GMP.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 12 allow outstanding incentive payments to be made to the scheme or insurer to which the pension rights of the member concerned have been transferred. Amendment No. 13 relieves the Occupational Pensions Board of the duty to examine scheme rules relating to "requisite benefits" for periods before clause 8 is operative.

Amendment No. 21 introduces a new clause, after clause 10, which enables regulations to be made about the appointment, tenure and powers of auditors of occupational pension schemes in relation to their duties in connection with the disclosure requirements on schemes.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Major: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 23, in page 15, line 30, leave out from "on" to end of line 33 and insert—

"the payment by a member of voluntary contributions".

No. 24, in line 34, leave out from "any" to "are" in line 36 and insert—

"voluntary contributions paid by a member".

No. 25, in line 38, leave out from "provide" to "and" in line 40 and insert—

"additional benefits for or in respect of him".

No. 26, in line 42, leave out from "regard" to end of line 43 and insert—

"(i) to the amount of the voluntary contributions; and

(ii) to the value of the other benefits under the scheme."

No. 27, in page 16, line 44, after "(4)" insert "or (6)".

No. 28, in page 17, line 24, after "(4)" insert "or (6)".

No. 29, in clause 14, page 18, line 25, leave out from "schemes" to "that" in line 26 and insert—

"shall be void; and

(b) any such term or rule to the effect".

No. 30, in line 28, leave out from "scheme" to end of line 30 and insert—

"of which the earner is not a member, or to one or other of a number of personal or occupational pension schemes of none of which he is a member, shall be unenforceable for so long as he is not a member of the scheme or any of the schemes."

No. 31, in clause 15, page 19, line 30, after "applies" insert—

"(including changes affecting adjustments under the regulations)".

Mr. Major: All these amendments are drafting amendments which involve no changes of substance to the Bill. I commend them to the House.

Clause 17

RETIREMENT PENSIONS

Lords amendment: No. 33, in page 22, line 4, after "contributions" insert "or earnings".

Mr. Major: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we will consider Lords amendment No. 34, in page 22, line 16, at end insert—

"(5) For the purpose of determining the additional pension falling to be calculated under section 6 of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 by virtue of section 7, 13 or 16(4) of that Act in a case where the deceased spouse died under pensionable age, the following definition shall be substituted for the definition of 'N' in section 6(2B)—

'N = the number of tax years which begin after 5th April 1978 and end before the date when entitlement to the additional pension commences, except that where—

(a) in a case in which the deceased spouse was a man, that number would be greater than 49; or

(b) in a case in which the deceased spouse was a woman, that number would be greater than 44,

N = 49 or 44, as the case may be;'.

(6) For the purpose of determining the additional pension falling to be calculated under section 6 of that Act by virtue of section 14 of that Act (invalidity pension for persons under pensionable age), the following definition shall be substituted for the definition of 'N' in section 6(2B)—

'N = the number of tax years which begin after 5th April 1978 and end before the first day of entitlement to the additional pension in the period of interruption of employment in which that day falls except that where—

(a) in a case in which the person entitled to the pension is a man, that number would be greater than 49; or

(b) in a case in which the person so entitled is a woman, that number would be greater than 44,

N = 49 or 44, as the case may be;'."

Mr. Major: The amendments to clause 17 are all of a technical or drafting nature.

Amendment No. 33 is consequential on the provisions in clause 72 and schedule 8, which relate to earnings factors.

Amendment No. 34 modifies the calculations for SERPS, additional pensions for widow's and invalidity pensions to ensure that they are made on the same basis as for a person reaching pensionable age in the same year.

Schedule 10

Minor and Consequential Amendments

Lords amendment: No. 135, in page 133, line 30, at end insert—

"2A. In section 64 (modification of occupational pension scheme by order of Occupational Pensions Board) the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (1)—

"(1A) The Board shall also have power on such an application to make an order—

(a) authorising the modification of the scheme with a view to achieving any one or more of such other purposes as may be prescribed; or

(b) modifying the scheme with a view to achieving any one or more of those purposes"."

Mr. Major: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following Lords amendments:

No. 136, in page 135, line 30, leave out

"(1)(a) (contracted-out rates of benefit)"

and insert

"(contracted-out rates of benefit)—

(a) in subsection (1)(a)."

No. 137, in page 135, line 33, at end insert—

"(b) in subsection (2)—

(i) after the words "this section" there shall be inserted the words "and sections 16(2B), 28(7A) and 59(1A) of the principal Act"; and

(ii) at the end there shall be added the words "or if as a result of a transfer payment or transfer under regulations made by virtue of section 38 below he is no longer entitled to guaranteed minimum pensions under the scheme by which the transfer payment or transfer is made and has not as a result of the transfer payment or transfer becomes entitled to guaranteed minimum pensions under the scheme to which the transfer payment or transfer is made.""

No. 138, in page 136, line 11, leave out paragraph 17 and insert—

"17. The following subsection shall be substituted for section 38(1) (transfer of accrued rights)—

(1) Regulations may prescribe circumstances in which and conditions subject to which—

(a) there may be made by one occupational pension scheme to another or by an occupational pension scheme to a personal pension scheme a transfer of or a transfer payment in respect of—

(i) an earner's accrued rights to guaranteed minimum pensions under a contracted-out scheme;

(ii) an earner's accrued rights to pensions under an occupational pension scheme which is not contracted-out, to the extent that those rights derive from his accrued rights to guaranteed minimum pensions under a contracted-out scheme; or

(iii) the liability for the payment of guaranteed minimum pensions to or in respect of any person who has become entitled to them;

(b) there may be made to an occupational pension scheme or a personal pension scheme a transfer of or a transfer payment in respect of an earner's accrued rights to guaranteed minimum pensions which are appropriately secured for the purposes of section 52C below."

No. 139, in page 138, line 17, leave out paragraph 25 and insert—

"25.—(1) Section 52C (cases where scheme's liability is discharged) shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect as if the following subsections were substituted for subsections (1) to (3)—

"(1) A transaction to which this section applies discharges the trustees or managers of an occupational pension scheme from their liability to provide for or in respect of any person either the requisite benefits or short service benefit or any alternative to short service benefit—

(a) if it is carried out not earlier than the time when that person's pensionable service terminates; and

(b) if and to the extent that it results in—

(i) the requisite benefits; or

(ii) short service benefit or an alternative to short service benefit, for or in respect of that person being appropriately secured; and

(c) in a case where the transaction takes place on or after 1st January 1986, if and to the extent that the requirements set out in anyone of paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subsection (5) below are satisfied.

(2) This section applies to the following transactions—

(a) the taking out or the transfer of the benefit of a policy of insurance or a number of such policies;

(b) the entry into or the transfer of the benefit of an annuity contract or a number of such contracts.".

(2) Subsection (5) of that section shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect as if "(1)" were substituted for "(2)(b)".

(3) In relation to transactions which take place after the commencement of section 8 above section 52C(1) of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 shall have effect with the substitution of the words "guaranteed minimum pensions" for the words "the requisite benefits", in both places where they occur.

25A.—(1) Subsection (1) of section 52D (supplementary provisions) shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect—

(a) as if the following paragraph were substituted for paragraph (b)—

( ) "(b) either—

(i)) the transaction wholly or partly securing them was carried out before 1st January 1986 and discharged the trustees or managers of the scheme as mentioned in subsection (1) of that section; or

(ii) it is carried out on or after that date without any of the requirements specified in subsection (5)(a) to (c) of that section being satisfied in relation to it and the scheme has been wound up;"; and

(b) as if for the words from "entitled" to "which" there were substituted the words "only entitled to such part (if any) of his or her guaranteed minimum pension as".

(2) In that subsection after the words "purposes of" there shall be inserted the words "sections 16(2B), 28(7A) and 59(1A) of the principal Act and".

25B. The following definition shall be inserted after the definition of "occupational pension scheme" in section 66(1)—

""personal pension scheme" has the meaning assigned to it by section 80(1) of the Social Security Act 1986;"."

Mr. Major: Although these amendments are technical, they are important for the smooth operation of the legislation in practice.

Amendment No. 135 gives authority to extend the existing powers of the Occupational Pensions Board to modify the rules of an occupational pension scheme. That would be used where those rules would otherwise prevent the scheme from complying with a statutory requirement or exercising an option available under the law — for example, one of the permitted options for reducing surplus funds as proposed under the Finance Bill.

Amendments Nos. 136, 137 and 138 substitute a revised version of section 38(1) in the Social Security Pensions Act 1975. This provides for the regulations about transfers of guaranteed minimum pensions. A central feature of the new pension arrangements will be that contracted-out rights will be capable of maximum transferability, when an employee changes his job or alters his pension arrangements. We have made it clear that existing schemes will not be required to provide transfer values of rights built up before the new arrangements begin to people who opt out of the scheme while continuing in the job. But where the right to a transfer value is available, we do not want to put unnecessary restrictions on what can be done with any GMP element which it may include. Where the individual wants to — but not of course otherwise — it seems reasonable that he should be allowed to apply the value of the GMP to buying "protected rights" in a personal pension or money purchase contracted-out scheme. These amendments enable regulations to be made about that. The details will be included in the consultative proposals which we will be issuing later this year.

Amendment No. 139 has been made in response to requests from the pensions practitioners. It clarifies that section 52C of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 provides a discharge for scheme trustees even in cases where the benefits secured by an insurance policy or annuity contract are not identical to those which would have been provided by the scheme. The revised provision will have effect from the date that section 52C was operative — 1 January 1986 — so that pension schemes can have confidence in the legal soundness of their arrangements to date.

Mr. Kirkwood: I wish to speak briefly to amendment No. 139. If my understanding is wrong, perhaps the Minister will put me right this evening or perhaps, more appropriately, drop me a note about it.

As I understand the amendment, we have introduced into paragraph 26 of schedule 10 a retrospective amendment to section 52C of the Social Security Act 1985. That was one of several amendments in a package taken in another place. It included amendments to the regulations which are designed to remove the present difficulty for scheme trustees and insurance companies in implementing the buying-out requirements under the Act. I understand and appreciate that.

However, although the amendment is fully retrospective to 1 January 1986, the Department is not taking power to make retrospective the related amendments to the regulations. If that is true, and if my understanding is correct, the present impasse on buying-out will not be dealt with. It will continue until all the amendments are effective. I suggest that paragraph 26 of schedule 10 should be looked at again with a view to an extension to provide that regulations made within six months of the commencement date of this paragraph under the powers in section 52C or paragraphs 13 and 20 of schedule 1A to the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 should also be retrospective to 1 January 1986. That would enable buying-out to proceed without any further delay once the proposed content of the amending regulations is known.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting and intriguing point to which I am sure there is a satisfactory answer. I shall raise precisely that interesting and intriguing point over the next day or so and write to the hon. Gentleman with a definitive reply.

Clause 19

INCOME RELATED BENEFITS

Lords amendment: No. 35, in page 24, line 8, at end insert—

"(1A) The scheme prescribed in subsection (1)(a) above shall provide for weekly payments of a community care addition to a chronically sick or disabled or elderly person, or in respect of a chronically sick or disabled child or other chronically sick or disabled elderly dependant.

(1B) Regulations shall provide that payments of community care addition made under subsection (1A) above shall be payable at a rate that shall be determined by reference to—

(a) the needs of the claimant or dependant in relation to his proper welfare and need for care and attention in a dwelling which he occupies or is to occupy as his home or in which he resides or is to reside as a member of a family, and

(b) the extent to which other benefits or payments that are payable under Part II of this Act fail to meet those needs.

(1C) Payments of community care addition under subsection (1A) above shall be payable in addition to any other income support payment, including any premium, and in addition to any attendance allowance or mobility allowance to which the claimant or dependant may be entitled."

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be appropriate to take the following Government amendment (a) in lieu of the Lords amendment, in page 27, line 37, at end insert—

'(2A) In relation to income support and housing benefit the applicable amount for a severely disabled person shall include an amount in respect of his being a severely disabled person.

(2B) Regulations may specify circumstances in which persons are to be treated as being or as not being severely disabled.'.

Amendment (i) to Government amendment (a), in line 4, at end insert—

'and that amount shall be determined in accordance with the severity of his disability.'.

Amendment (ii) to Government amendment (a), in line 6, at end add—

'and how the severity of the disability of such persons is to be assessed.'

Amendment (iii) to Government amendment (a), in line 6, at end add—

'(2C) The amount or amounts referred to in subsection (2A) above shall be calculated with regard to the cost incurred by severely disabled persons in living as householders or as members of a household and to the income support payments available to such persons in residential care homes.'.

Mr. Newton: I think that the House understands that the background to this important debate on the needs and interests of disabled people, especially severely disabled people, is one in which we have actively and consciously sought, through the new income support scheme and as shown by the illustrative figures we have published, to improve the support made available to less well off disabled people generally.

Under our proposals, we shall be paying the disability premium automatically, without a qualifying period, to people receiving one of the disability or continuing incapacity benefits. It will be paid without a time limit for blind claimants and claimants will qualify for the premium on grounds of incapacity for work after 28 weeks, compared with the present one-year qualifying rule for the long-term rate. The premium will be payable where either the claimant or a partner is receiving one of the qualifying benefits, unlike the position for the long-term rate, and our proposals on equal treatment should also make it easier for a disabled partner to qualify the whole family for extra help. There will also be considerable improvements in the amount of part-time earnings. Disabled claimants who are in a position to have some part-time earnings can retain them without it affecting their benefit to the extent that it would at present.

I sum up those points by saying that on the illustrative figures—they are avowedly illustrative—published in the technical annex, our proposals for disability premium would imply an increase of about £50 million a year for those in receipt of it, by comparison with the present system. That is something we will be proud of when we have had the opportunity to implement it. I think that the House will accept that it shows our good intentions in this area.

Alongside that, we have made it clear that there will be transitional protection arrangements, where they would be necessary, to ensure that income support payments will make up weekly cash income to at least the same level as supplementary benefit did before the change in the system.

Having made those points about general improvement in support for the less well off disabled people, which is reflected in the policies we have put forward in the Bill and the figures in the illustrative tables, I want to acknowledge that throughout discussions on the Bill there has been concern about the position of what is acknowledged to be a small group of very severely disabled people, especially those who are in receipt, under the present system, of very high weekly additional payments in respect of domestic assistance. The position that we adopted during some of the earlier discussions was that that was very much the kind of problem, relating as it did to the individual needs of a relatively small number of people, that we would expect to find an appropriate way of dealing with through the social fund.

However, it was clear from discussions in Committee and on Report and from quarters outside the House that the general statement of intent about our aim to find a new solution to the problem of those severely disabled people had fallen short of satisfying those who rightly and properly represent the interests of that group. Concern was expressed about both the possible change from regulated entitlement to the provisions represented by the social fund, and about the actual position, especially at the point of change and despite what had been said about transitional protection, of those who were receiving large amounts of weekly help with domestic assistance.

When the matter was debated in the other place, my noble Friend Baroness Trumpington gave two commitments on behalf of the Government. The first was to improve transitional protection for severely disabled people receiving extensive support by way of the domestic assistance provision addition. It was made clear that the amount would continue to be paid separately to, and on top of, any other transitional protection needed. It was further made clear that it would be increased at future upratings, if the need continued, to maintain its value. That goes well beyond the normal arrangements for transitional protection, but it was intended to offer assurance to those receiving these relatively high weekly payments.

6.30 pm

The second assurance given was that we would be seeking new arrangements to continue support for similar new cases after the changes in 1988, and that that would be the subject of consultation with interested groups.

Those undertakings were welcomed in the other place, as I am sure that they will be welcomed here, especially that about transitional protection in these cases, which I am happy to repeat tonight. Nevertheless, the other place felt that the Government had not gone far enough to overcome the anxieties that had been expressed. Clearly, it felt that there should continue to be some regulated entitlement, so it passed what is now Lords amendment No. 35.

The amendment that I am moving alongside the motion to disagree with Lords amendment No. 35 represents our clear acceptance of the basic proposition that there should continue to be a regulated system of weekly benefit directed to the kind of needs that have been the cause of concern. The fact that I am moving the motion makes it clear that we do not feel able to accept the Lords amendment in the terms in which it was passed. The amendment includes payments to groups such as the "chronically sick and disabled" and "elderly people", neither of which terms is further defined. I accept that it would be possible to find some way to define "chronically sick and disabled" people, but the fact that elderly people are included in such a way would inescapably mean that the provisions would cover up to 1·75 million supplementary pensioners. In other words, the amendment goes massively beyond any possible definition of the group that has given rise to the concern that has led to the amendment.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Is the Minister prepared to say what the weekly payment will be? Will he estimate what will be the cost of the amendment?

Mr. Newton: I am and I will, but I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to make my speech in the order in which I wish to make it, which I hope is reasonably rational and logical.

The other principal point that I shall make, apart from what might be called technical nit-picking, is that the adjudication officer would be expected to deal with the payments by reference to a person's "proper welfare and need for care and attention".

Those are wide and imprecise phrases, and the latter in particular raises questions of overlap with local authority service responsibilities, particularly those under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act to provide assistance in the home.

The enormous potential coverage of the amendment and the wider scope of the phrases that are used and would have to be assessed by social security adjudication officers means that, in the terms in which it has been passed, the amendment is simply unworkable with the current arrangements of the social security system. Potentially, it would involve us in taking over a wide part of the work of local authority social services departments in a way that the social security system is simply not qualified to carry out.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Minister says that the amendment would be unworkable. If the Government amendment is accepted, will more or fewer people be eligible compared to what would be the position if the Lords amendment were passed?

Mr. Newton: I shall again come to that point. By definition, it is clear that since I have resisted the amendment partly on the ground that potentially it covers the entire supplementary pensioner population, I am unlikely to be moving a Government amendment that would run wider than that.

Mr. Field: That is a cut.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is now being merely mischievous. I shall come to that point.

We are seeking to accept the spirit of the way in which the amendment was spoken to and passed in the other place. We are seeking an additional disablement premium —one might call it a severe disablement premium. I am happy to see the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) in her place. That premium also has the advantage of responding to the recommendation of the Select Committee on Social Services, that we should consider the introduction of a two-tier disablement premium. That is what the Government's amendment is designed to bring about.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Government amendment (a) says:

"the applicable amount for a severely disabled person shall include an amount in respect of his being a severely disabled person."

Is that amount a variable sum or is it a fixed amount that will be appropriate to disabled people, however severe the disability? Is there scope in the way that this measure will be used to vary that in line with the degree of disability?

Mr. Newton: I am tempted to say that I will be grateful if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to set out my points in logical order. However, the direct answer is that the intention is that this shall be a fixed sum, a point to which I shall return.

As an additional sign of our good intentions, I point out that there is no need to amend the Bill to provide for a severe disablement premium. There are ample powers within the Bill as it stands for us to have as many premiums as we wish. We have thought it right to make clear our intentions and to respond to the feelings both in this place and the other place. Nevertheless, we wished to table an amendment that specifically provides for a severe disablement premium.

We are proposing a higher and additional premium for a particular group of disabled people. It will be paid on top of the other structural improvements for disabled people in the Bill, and in particular the disablement premium. As I have said, in effect it provides the two-tier disablement premium that many commentators, including the Select Committee, have urged upon us. It will be paid as an extra amount to severely disabled people who are living on their own, and who are most likely to need extra support and care. It will be paid to them direct and as of right within the income support scheme. It will also form part of the assessment of need in the housing benefit rules.

In considering the issue, we have sought criteria that are consistent with other social security arrangements. Our intention is that receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance should be the first qualifying condition. The present domestic assistance addition already has a condition that there must be no one in the household capable of carrying out normal domestic duties. The purpose behind that rule, on the need for extra support to maintain independence that cannot otherwise be provided, is a sensible one.

We have recently announced a major extension of the invalid care allowance as the benefit that is paid to those caring for disabled people. Consistent with that, we intend that the extra disablement premium will be paid direct to a severely disabled person where there is no one receiving or eligible for the invalid care allowance in respect of that person's care needs. We envisage setting the rate at the same level as for invalid care allowance, currently, although shortly to rise, £23 a week. This will be paid on top of the disablement premium in relevant cases. It is nearly double the rate of the basic disablement premium for a single person that is illustrated in the technical annex.

Our estimate is that up to 10,000 severely disabled people could qualify for this additional premium, at a cost of up to £12 million. It will go to a far wider range of people than those who currently receive the domestic assistance addition. Our latest information, for December 1984, shows that only 3,150 people then received the domestic assistance addition, of whom 3,000 received £10 or less, compared with the figure of £23 that I have mentioned.

On the basis of those figures, total expenditure on the current domestic assistance addition was well below £1 million. We expect that this measure will lead to a twelvefold increase in expenditure on severely disabled people and to at least a trebling of the number of people who are helped by the current domestic assistance addition. It is a very substantial move towards meeting the points that were made in another place. No less important is the fact that it represents a substantial move towards——

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Newton: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to finish this point.

It represents a very substantial move towards extending the help that is available. It will help a much larger number of severely disabled people than are helped by the existing arrangements. Thus, it will further the objectives that unite all right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Ashley: Does the Minister——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the Minister is giving way.

Mr. Newton: I had finished, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am happy to allow the right hon. Gentleman to appear to intervene during my speech, if he so wishes.

Mr. Ashley: The Minister says that this is a substantial increase, but he also said that the amounts are to be fixed. How can fixed amounts provide for people with different disabilities who require separate amounts? Is the Minister able to give a categoric assurance that no fewer people will be living in the community and that these proposals will not force them to live in institutions?

Mr. Newton: The right hon. Gentleman will be very well aware that it would be very unwise of me to give a categorical assurance of the breadth that he seeks. It is clear, from the figures that I have just given, that substantially more severely disabled people who are living in the community will receive significant additional help, compared with what they receive under the present income support scheme. That must help to serve the objective that all of us have in mind of extending the effectiveness and the real meaning of care in the community.

Mr. Alfred Morris: It will excite no surprise in the House when I say that I very much agree with Lords amendment No. 35. The amendment is, of course, virtually identical to the one I moved at the Bill's Report stage in this House on 19 May. Except for the Minister, everyone who took part in the debate on my amendment, from both sides of the House, spoke in support of what I was proposing. Yet the Government defeated the amendment on a three-line Whip.

In another place, their Lordships were clearly much more impressed by the speeches in favour of my amendment than they were by the fiercely whipped vote by which it was defeated. Maurice Jackson, in Therapy's widely read parliamentary column, wrote after the Lords debate:

"What happens now? The Government, of course, with its big Commons majority, could try to reverse the Lords amendment when the Bill returns for final examination by MPs. My prediction is that they will do nothing of the sort, but retire from the field—battered and bloody and not a little bowed—yielding victory with as much grace as they can muster."

In fact, however, the Government are still opposing the amendment. Their own alternative amendment is grossly unsatisfactory and I hope very much that the Lords, when the Bill returns to them, will stand their ground and insist that the protection we are seeking for severely disabled people stays in the Bill. At the same time, I hope they will appreciate that the outrageously strict guillotine on the time available to us today makes it impossible for there to be more than one vote at the conclusion of this debate.

This is a deeply important debate for severely disabled people. It is a debate not about compassion but about rights and, in particular, about the right of every disabled person to live, wherever that can be made possible, both independently and with dignity in his or her own home.

The outcome of the debate will quite literally, as Lord Henderson of Brompton said in another place, mean the difference between life at home and life in an institution for many of the most severely disabled people in this country. On 19 May and again in the Lords, numerous cases were quoted of the kind of people who will lose out. They were the cases of very severely disabled people who now live independently at home by virtue of the domestic care allowance which, if the Government have their way, will disappear.

Let me remind the Minister of just two cases that were drawn to my attention by the organisations of disabled people. One is that of a woman who is paralysed from the neck down after a road accident. She requires help with virtually all aspects of personal care and was looked after by an elderly mother until increasing frailty left her unable to cope. She then had to spend weekends in bed until she received the domestic care allowance. Until the Bill was amended in the Lords, a person like her would have lost much more than the Minister is now proposing in his amendment.

Mr. Frank Field: Has my right hon. Friend not reached a most important point? Although the Government, for once, have carefully costed this amendment, the one crucial piece of information that they have not given us is whether some disabled people, even if the amendment is passed, will still be worse off.

Mr. Morris: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is incontrovertibly the fact that some of the most severely disabled people will be very much worse off if the domestic care allowance disappears without an adequate replacement.

Another case drawn to my attention was that of a young man who recently graduated from university. He not only needs help with washing, dressing and using the toilet, but also has to be turned in bed frequently during the night. Before the Lords amendment, the loss in a case like his would have been £48·55 a week and there is no doubt whatever that admission to an institution would have resulted at a cost to the taxpayer of at least £180 a week.

Everyone who knows the facts sees that residential care would cost the taxpayer more than the benefits that the Government want to scrap. That is why the Spastics Society condemned the Government's attitude as "self-defeating" and why Eric Ward-Rowe, a war-blinded campaigner for the disabled and a life-long Conservative, described the Bill as a "wicked attack" on severely disabled people.

The Government's amendment has not removed the fear of their organisations that many severely disabled people will lose their independence and they are very angry about the Government's treatment of their representations. When the Bill went into Committee in this House, six organisations wrote to the Secretary of State and the Minister for the Disabled about their concern. They were the Disablement Income Group, the British Council of Organisations of Disabled People, Disability Alliance, the Spastics Society, the Royal National Institute for the Blind and the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation.

On 21 February, they requested a meeting with Ministers. The meeting took place on 17 March and the six organisations wrote again, on 20 March, for clarification of the Government's position. No reply was received. Then on 14 May—in advance of the Report stage in this House—the organisations wrote asking for some comment about the community care addition I was proposing. No reply was received. Yet again, on 9 July, they wrote to Ministers for their views about the provision of a community care addition. No reply has been received. As Peter Large of the Disablement Income Group has commented:

"The absence of any reply since the meeting of 17 March makes it difficult to be constructive. In my opinion, the absence of a reply to three letters from six reputable charities, all of them expert in the field of disability, is a sign either of an arrogant disregard for the needs of disabled people or of inefficiency".

At this last hour of our proceedings on the Bill the Minister produces what he claims to be a solution. Even disregarding the spelling on yesterday's Order Paper, it looked more like a Back-Bench amendment on the back of an envelope than the fruit of two years' deliberations by a Department of State. All it does is to allow a higher rate of payment to severely disabled people, yet the Minister has known of the problem ever since he took the chair of the DHSS review of supplementary benefits over two years ago.

The House now needs cast-iron assurances that the Minister will pay extra amounts of the order of £50 to £60 a week—or perhaps even more—to people who require such sums to pay for the support that they need to live in the community. This is why right hon. and hon. Members have tabled amendments to the Government amendment.

The Opposition would prefer Lords amendment No. 35 to be retained because it would ensure that the precise needs of severely disabled people are met. However, it may be possible to describe in regulations the people about whom the House is so concerned in a way that they can be easily and accurately identified by adjudication officers and paid a fixed-rate benefit that is high enough to enable them to live or to continue to live in their own homes. The danger is that the defects of a basic disablement premium will simply be repeated in the proposed new premium.

If the Minister just thinks of a number and picks some convenient passport off the shelf, he will fail to meet the needs of some of the most disabled people. If he has in mind, as seems to be the case, something of the order of an extra £23 a week for people on income support who are in receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance, then I must emphasise to him that he will be sentencing many disabled people to indefinite institutional care.

Ministers refused to speak to organisations of and for disabled people before tabling their amendments. In the next 48 hours a solution must be found that will satisfy their legitimate claims. The amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) and colleagues from the all-party disablement group would give the Minister discretion to pay more than one rate of the new premium. That would make it much easier for him to target resources on those identified as being in the greatest need. The amendments also relate the amounts to the costs incurred by severely disabled people on a general rather than on an individual basis and to the level of support available in residential care. In the tiny amount of time available, the all-party disablement group has been doing the Minister's work for him and has been bending over backwards to meet his administrative complaints about Lords amendment No. 35, which I am sure the membership of the all-party group still hope will be accepted by the House.

The House owes a great debt to the Select Committee on Social Services under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) for the way in which it has exposed in its recent report the illogicality of providing substantial sums to people in residential care and practically nothing to disabled people living in the community. The Opposition seek the introduction of non-means-tested payments to disabled people which would allow them to make their own choices. The whole structure of the Bill is inimical to the interests of disabled people and all the amendments we have tabled are exercises in damage limitation. Without Lords amendment No. 35 or an acceptable alternative, the damage to severely disabled people after April 1988 will be appalling.

As their former Minister, I know that disabled people crave nothing more than to live independently at home. The Government's stance on this issue is thus egregiously cruel. It makes total nonsense of the claim that their Bill helps those most in need. Since the Government were routed in the local government elections, we have heard much of their claim about a "caring" new image, but it is totally uncaring to drive into institutions disabled people who, with adequate help, could live at home.

One of the Bill's probable victims has summed it all up. She said: "If that's caring, the word has lost its meaning." I strongly urge all hon. Members in all parts of the House to respond to her anguish, in the way that she would wish, by supporting the Lords amendment.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I cannot follow the line taken by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), because it was one of extreme criticism of the attempts by my hon. Friend the Minister to find a solution to what has proved to be a difficult problem. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the way in which he has kept in close contact with the all-party disablement group to try to find a solution to this problem, which is to find a satisfactory method of replacing the accumulation of additional allowances which the severely disabled are able to obtain under the present system. We need to find a replacement for that accumulation, and the amount will vary from one person to another but will be sufficient to allow disabled people to live in the community rather than in institutions.

Over the last two years my hon. Friend has assured us that he is aware of the need to secure for this small but important group of severely handicapped people a method by which they would not suffer as a result of the change over to income support. I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend has been able to find an additional disability premium which will allow those people nearly to reach that final objective, but I am worried that in a couple of years a new group of severely disabled, blind and handicapped people will be outside the continuity assurances that have been given to those who are presently severely disabled and who will continue to receive amounts equivalent to the present allowance.

In a couple of years, disabled people in the 16-plus group will miss out on the level of allowances. They will require just as much help as similarly disabled people who will continue to receive the full guaranteed benefits. They will require just as much help for special diets, heating, blindness allowance and domestic assistance and all the other benefits that build up and allow disabled people to live in the community rather than have to return to institutional or residential home care.

The Lords amendment is rather like the one tabled on Report by the all-party disablement group and like the amendments that we have tabled. The benefit of those amendments was that they provided flexibility and were attractive because of that. They took account of individual needs, because we all know that disability is unique to each person and that the financial needs vary from one person to another. The single objective is to give each disabled person the means to live in the community, and my worry about the Government amendment is that it could mean everything or nothing. I was relieved to hear further details from my hon. Friend about the amounts that will be made available, because they come close to securing the final objective.

My hon. Friend talked about a second tier disability premium of some £23 on top of the £12 basic disability premium. That takes in many disabled people who might have found themselves with nothing but the basic disability premium. I appreciate the problem that has faced my hon. Friend in trying to find a system that would provide for a clearly defined flat rate addition. That is the nub of the problem that the Government face.

My hon. Friend's proposal will provide about 12 times as much financial help as the domestic assistance allowance that it replaces, and about three times as many disabled people will receive it. However, that does not address the main point that we have raised again and again about the small but vital group of severely disabled people. It is upon them that the full focus of attention will be directed. They could normally have expected to receive amounts in excess of the combined second tier and the basic disability premium.

Mr. Wigley: Will the hon. Gentleman address himself to the fact that the Spastics Society estimates that to keep a severely disabled person in institutional care costs between £230 and £280 a week, of which the DHSS may be paying £180?

Mr. Hannam: The hon. Gentleman has just pre-empted exactly the point that I was about to make. To find the extra few pounds a week to ensure that disabled people remain in the community rather than being in institutional care would save hundreds of pounds of taxpayers' money and prevent the return of disabled people to a point from which we have tried to move away.

Therefore, I am not happy to accept the Government amendment and the Bill as it stands without a further assurance from my hon. Friend that he will find a way to meet the needs of the group of people about whom we are talking in the next few days with a more flexible use of the new system.

Will my hon. Friend consider a suggestion made to me by the manager of my local DHSS office, which happens to have the largest number of claimants in the country? I cannot praise the manager highly enough for the interest that she takes in the needs of her clients and the disabled in particular. She said that, looking at the proposed workings of the social fund, it would be eminently possible for her and her staff to enable the small group of severely disabled people in the community, about whom they all know, to have the necessary topping up amount on a weekly basis if necessary. If that flexibility were built into the system, she said that she and her staff would have no problem.

I hope that my hon. Friend will consider whether he can, through the regulations that he will be applying, look at that suggestion closely and introduce a method to ensure that this small but vital group of disabled people do not find themselves deprived of that essential £5, £10 or £15 a week that enables them to live in the community rather than having to return to institutional care.

Mr. Ashley: The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) plays a prominent role in the all-party disablement group and I share many of his views. However, I do not think that the Minister was quite as magnanimous as the hon. Gentleman made out. This is obviously a party-political difference, despite the attempts that we make in the group to find some kind of consensus. The hon. Gentleman knows that the Minister is failing to meet the requirements of the other place. The Lords amendment made necessary provisions for severely disabled people, but the Minister has refused to accept it. He is offering us a substitute which he claims is just as good as the Lords amendment but, of course, it is not. It is inadequate and it fails on a number of counts to help severely disabled people in the way that the all-party disablement group would have wanted. However, I shall not press the hon. Member for Exeter on that point.

Will the Minister clarify one point that he made? He did not answer my question about different premiums to help different people with different disabilities, and I hope that he will be able to do so when he replies. The Minister said that the premium would be paid only to people living on their own and receiving the high rate of attendance allowance. That is an unusual provision. Many people need extra money for someone living with them. Some good friends of ours are severely disabled and help those of us who play a prominent role in helping those with disability. They must have people living with them. If such people were excluded, it would be a scandal. I hope that I have misunderstood the Minister, but if I have not, there will be hell to pay. Those people must not be deprived of the special premium that the Minister has promised.

The Opposition's amendment seeks to introduce different amounts for different people. That is the crux of the matter. A general allowance is of no use at all, because disabled people cannot simply be lumped together and given X amount of money. That cannot be done; it is most unrealistic. Our intention is to focus particular additional resources on those who specifically need them.

The basis point of the Opposition's amendment is to recognise the individuality of disability. We recognise that individual disabled people require individual payments for specific individual needs. Any alternative in the form of a general payment to all severely disabled people—I put this seriously to the Minister—is inadequate, demeaning and insulting. It is offensive to lump all disabled people together in one homogeneous group.

In all my years in the House I have never spoken of "the disabled". There is no such thing. Each disabled person has an individual problem. I know the Minister recognises that because he meets many disabled people. However, these provisions do not meet that fundamental point and the Minister should have a battle with his own Department, and the Secretary of State should take the point on board. Disabled people need individual payments. We do not want a lump sum for everyone. A few disabled people may receive a bit more than they need, but many will not.

What does it mean to disabled people not to get what they need? We are not speaking of a few people going without a few luxuries. If severely disabled people do not get what they need, they will not be able to get the basic resources and necessities of life. They cannot obtain the care that is vital to their wellbeing. They cannot go to the toilet, have a bath, use the telephone, feed, wash or dress themselves without help. If they cannot use their legs and arms, they must be provided with adequate resources to enable them to cope.

I make no party-political point when I say that we all know that many local authorities simply do not provide the wherewithal for disabled people. There are some fine authorities, but there are some lousy ones. Some appalling authorities leave severely disabled people without basic necessities. We could say that that is not our business but local authority business—the Minister hinted at this in his speech—but we must find some means in this House of Commons of providing the essential specific disability payment for the individual. There is no alternative. That is the only answer, and I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind.

I have a lot more to say, but I shall not go on. I want to drive that point home to the Minister. If he takes that point on board, he will go much further towards helping severely disabled people than he could by any other single thing that he could do.

Mr. Newton: I want to make three points in reply. First, in the sense in which the word has been used, there are no victims of this proposal in view of the arrangements that we have made for transitional protection.

Secondly, I want to make it clear that, in contradiction to what has been suggested, the noble Lord Henderson who moved the amendment in the other place made it clear that he was aiming for an amendment which would be related to the needs of 2,000 or 3,000 people. There can be no doubt that the amendment goes much wider than that, but that was his explicit intention in moving the amendment.

The third point is that, of the 3,000 people at whom the Lords amendment was aimed, the vast majority receive far less than we propose to make available under the new premium. Only 50 persons receive more than £20 a week, according to the latest information available.

I take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam), that part of our purpose has always been to treat disabled people's needs individually and flexibly. Resistance to doing that through the social fund has led to the amendment. We have sought to respond to it, but we do not rule out the possibility of also meeting the special needs of disabled people through the social fund, which is one of the purposes for which it was designed and intended. We hope that the social fund will work closely with local authorities, because none of us would wish them to cease caring for disabled people. One of our objectives is to bring about a better working relationship between the Department, in its social security role and in its wider caring role, and local authorities in their responsibilities for sick and disabled people.

I hope that the House will recognise that a change from a benefit which costs £1 million and helps 3,000 people to a benefit that we expect to cost £12 million and to help 10,000 people represents a substantial, significant and important move.

Mr. Wigley: I hope that the House of Lords will realise when it considers the matter——

It being two hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the motion relating to the Social Security Bill (Allocation of Time), MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Clause 20

AMOUNT ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 40, in page 27, line 20, at end insert—

"and shall include the whole of the amount which he is liable to pay by way of rates in respect of his home."

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The first point to make is that there is nothing in the Bill concerned with 20 per cent. contributions to rates. The Government have made it clear that they want to see greater accountability in local government and that they believe that it is a serious defect of present arrangements that many people have no financial interest in the current level of rates charged or in any proposed increase. We have made it clear that we will put proposals to Parliament to change that position, but this Bill is not the vehicle for that change.

The powers in the Bill go no further than the provisions in existing legislation. When the Government put forward their proposals on domestic rates as they now are, they will be in the form of regulations which will be debated by both Houses. But, of course, the Government are also consulting on the proposals for a new community charge. That consultation is not yet complete, but it is clear that any change there would require primary legislation.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I am sure that the Secretary of State will be perfectly frank with the House. I appreciate that a measure will be introduced in due course, but does he agree that the Government intend to introduce a measure whereby at least 20 per cent. will be paid by those on supplementary benefit?

Mr. Fowler: The point is that this Bill is not the vehicle for that change. I see that we are agreed upon that.

Basically, the amendment pre-empts that decision. Rather than waiting for the proposition to be put, the authors of the amendment have used the opportunity of this Bill to seek to prevent any action at all. Let us be clear that the effect of the amendment is not just to make impossible a 20 per cent. contribution to rates; it would make any contribution impossible. It would not be possible to have a 15 per cent. contribution, a 10 per cent. contribution, a 5 per cent. contribution, or a 1 per cent. contribution. I must say that I find that totally unacceptable. It is unacceptable for the reasons given in the other place by my noble Friend Lord Boyd-Carpenter. It is an attempt to pre-empt Government policy on the whole question of local government finance.

Even on its own terms the amendment is wrong on several important counts. It would diminish a major achievement in the Bill—fairer treatment between those in work and those not in work. It would further weaken the link between payment for and use of services provided by local authorities. There would be greater expenditure on a benefit which has increased dramatically in recent years.

The central aim of the reforms is to treat people at the same level of income in exactly the same way, whether they are in or out of work. Thus, one has the same maximum for both. The amendment would guarantee a 100 per cent. rebate of domestic rates for those with incomes at or below the income support level.

There is a technical flaw in this, as it would also prevent any deduction from housing benefit to take account of the contribution towards domestic rates expected from non-dependent members of the same household. Thus, even though the non-dependent is earning, say, £100 a week, no deduction could be made from housing benefit. It cannot be right that a head of household should receive 100 per cent. help from the taxpayer with domestic rates when other members of the household are in full-time work. The cost of that would be about £100 million. But under the present system, and under any changed system, the effect would be to create sharp reductions in benefit as income rises. That would create new unemployment and a poverty trap which the unified structure in the Bill is designed to avoid. It could lead also to the reintroduction of housing benefit supplement.

The only way to avoid the effect of the amendment would be to extend 100 per cent. help with rates to all those who qualify for benefit. That would have the effect of reducing, not increasing, accountability.

7.30 pm

Currently, a substantial minority of householders — about 3 million — are insulated entirely from rises in domestic rates. A scheme which started with 100 per cent. maximum assistance would insulate even greater numbers from the consequences of their local authorities' spending policies. I shall develop that. At present, for standard housing benefit cases, the starting point for calculating rate rebates is 60 per cent. of the claimant's rates. That means that if his rates increase by £1 a week his rebate automatically increases by 60p a week, unless his income or other circumstances change. It would be the same for everyone receiving a rebate, however large or small his rebate was initially. But under a scheme that is based on 100 per cent. of rates, a £1 increase in weekly rates would produce a £1 increase in benefit, again no matter how much rebate the individual was receiving initially. Even if he was entitled to a rebate of only a few pence a week, a £1 rise in rates would still lead to a £1 rise in his rebate if his circumstances remained the same.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): Will the Secretary of State explain why similar logic should not extend to rents?

Mr. Fowler: We are not making the same proposals for rents. We are seeking more accountability within the rating system between local authorities and those who elect local authorities. The hon. Gentleman knows that the Government have made that clear from the beginning.

In other words, every household receiving a rate rebate — about 5·5 million, on the basis of our illustrative figures—would no longer have any financial interest in the spending policies of its local authority. That would weaken and, in some authorities, threaten to destroy the link between those who vote for more services, those who use the services and those who pay for them. That would be bad for local accountability and for personal responsibility. Our initial proposal is that everyone should pay a contribution towards his domestic rates. This proposal will have to be developed in the light of the consultations and discussions on the proposals in the Green Paper, "Paying for Local Government". In principle, however, our case is clear and remains firm. Local electors must be aware of the costs of the policies that they are invited to support.

Finally, we have been entirely open in our commitment to restrain the cost of housing benefit. Total expenditure on assistance with rent and rates has more than doubled over the past six years. Current expenditure is estimated to be about £4·5 billion. At the same time, the numbers have risen so that one in three households is receiving some assistance. Overall, our proposals seek to restrain future housing benefit expenditure, and the proposal that everyone should make a contribution towards his domestic rates is an important part of that saving. I do not believe that the Government can be pre-empted from making financially important proposals of this sort.

The Opposition have sought to alarm people and will no doubt seek to do so again. I understand that they will claim that this measure will have dire consequences for poor households. We should be clear that we are talking about benefit rates to be set at the uprating that is due to take place in the autumn of 1987, not at the next uprating. Even on the illustrative figures published with the White Paper, the majority of those on income support would not experience any reduction in disposable income overall.

In summary, the amendment would not increase accountability in local government. In fact, it would reduce it. It would not restrain future spending on housing benefit. Instead, it would multiply it. Above all, the amendment is out of time. It seeks to pre-empt the Government's right to make proposals to Parliament in a vital area of policy. That is a fundamental issue, and I ask the House for its support.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I remind the House that the amendment involves privilege.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Contrary to the clear decision and vote of a significant majority in another place, the Government are seeking to revert to their original intention to impose this iniquitous 20 per cent. rates payment on even the poorest in our society. This proposal has been rejected by the Government's housing review committee, which was set up in the course of the social security reviews. It has been rejected virtually unanimously by public opinion in the course of consultation. It has been rejected—this is the reason for the debate—by a decisive vote in another place. Lastly, it has been rejected by the Social Security Advisory Committee, the Government's own advisory body. There is no support anywhere for this measure except among the Institute of Directors and among those who, to their shame, submit to the Tory Whip in this place.

Contrary to the Secretary of State's complacency, the Government's proposal will mean that the poorest claimants, even those on supplementary benefit, will have to use money which is intended for food and clothing as well as fuel to pay part of their rates. The proposal has been opposed by a wide range of political opinion, as well as by local authorities and those concerned about the welfare of claimants. Contrary to the Secretary of State's statement, the amendment is not an attempt to pre-empt the Government's policy. The vote in another place was not an attempt to pre-empt Government policy on local finance.

The Government's action is a deliberate one to cut benefit by between £300 million and £400 million a year, and this will affect some of the poorest in our society. That and that alone is the reason why the Government's proposal has been brought back to the House.

The Opposition have two main complaints about the 20 per cent. proposal. We say that it will cause hardship and that administratively it will be highly inefficient. Supplementary benefit claimants — if the right hon. Gentleman has any doubt about this I suggest that he should have rather more experience of what it is like to live on supplementary benefit — already have a pretty hard time getting by. By any standard, their income is extremely low. Many have to forgo necessities or get into debt, or both.

I shall quote one example of the impact of the Government's proposal. Let us consider the position of a pensioner couple aged 72 and 74 years whose sole income consists of supplementary benefit of £64·90, including allowances for the wife, who is diabetic, and heating addition. That is their income, apart from rent and rate rebates. They receive a full rent rebate, plus a fuel rebate of £7·50 and an allowance for water rates of £1·50. That is the position of a fairly typical couple in retirement. Their income support would total £63·25, out of which they would have to pay water rates and 20 per cent. of their domestic rates. They would be worse off by £4·65 per week. The 20 per cent. rate rebate cut would be £1·50 of the loss. That is a substantial cut. I am amazed that anyone in the House believes that that is justified and can find it in himself to vote for it.

Mr. Winnick: As my hon. Friend says, is not the situation deplorable? Is it not the case that, whereas now those on supplementary benefit are entitled to some assistance during a harsh winter, however bureaucratic the regulations are, and however inadequate the sums are, under the new position, such sums will not be paid? Therefore, apart from all the other difficulties of paying 20 per cent. in rates, certainly during the winter months, the people concerned are likely to have less income than they have now.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend is right. We are debating just one item from the Social Security Bill. There are several others and, unfortunately, some of them combine. Therefore, the overall loss of income in particular cases, which is what matters, is greater than that as a result of any single one of the cuts, such as the one that we are now debating.

The DHSS tax-benefit model, which is the best indicator of the effect of the proposal, suggests that the average loss to claimants from the measure will be about £1·25 a week. In certain places where there is a great deal of poverty, it will be considerably higher. In Camden, it will be more than £3 a week because the average rent level there is over £15. In Islington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Brent and Hounslow it will be over £2·50 a week, which is a considerable sum to people on low incomes. The loss may not seem a lot to many hon. Members, but it is sobering to reflect that it is almost a day's benefit, in supplementary and child benefit combined, for a 10-year-old. Claimants live in a hard world where those figures are a serious business. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) smiles. We know that she comes from a very rich and well-off family, with both her income and that of her husband. She would do well to listen carefully to the effects that the measure has on many people with very low incomes, something that she has never experienced in her life.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way. If the hon. Lady is insulting enough—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] If the hon. Lady is insulting——

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Meacher: If the hon. Lady is——

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way. If the hon. Lady insults those whom we are discussing tonight, she has no right to speak at this time. She can make her own speech in her own time.

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As it appears to be in order for the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to make such insulting remarks across the Chamber, is it not in order for him to give me a little time to reply?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I cannot compel an hon. Member to give way to someone who seeks to intervene.

Mr. Fowler: I simply want to say to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that I gave way to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) a moment ago. Surely, having referred directly to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), he will at least have the courage to give way to her.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend asked a proper and courteous question. I only wish that the Secretary of State were as defensive of the poor people as he is of some of his insulting hon. Friends.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Meacher: The Social Security Advisory Committee had this to say:

"We are . . .seriously concerned"—

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Lady's resentment, but she must not persist in seeking to intervene when the hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. Meacher: The Social Security Advisory Committee, which advises the Government, had this to say:

"We are . . .seriously concerned at the proposal to limit eligible rates to a level which is less than 100 per cent.—and possibly as low as 80 per cent. Our concern is twofold: First, and most important, we believe that the proposal could cause real hardship to many claimants, especially those on income support; and second, the proposal will cause local authorities extra administrative difficulties, and therefore higher administrative costs, at a time when the Government is committed to simplifying administration and controlling costs".

The SSAC is right on that score, too.

The amounts regained from claimants may cause hardship—I believe that they will but they are puny in administrative terms, and local authorities regard the costs of collecting them as a nonsense, out of all proportion to the amounts collected and directly contrary to considerations of efficiency in social security. That applies even more to the costs of pursuing arrears, leaving aside the effects on claimants of losing furniture to the bailiffs or appearing in court.

7.45 pm

A paper has been passed to me from the Department of the Environment, which is headed:

"The community charge: Enforcement of payment."

Although the paper is about collecting the community charge, it also applies to collecting arrears on the 20 per cent. rates payment. It talks of introducing "time to pay" orders and attachment of earnings to cover arrears, with direct payment arrangements by the DHSS where debtors are on benefit. That is particularly interesting. I quote from that paragraph:

"Attachment of earnings would not cover those on benefit who had fallen into arrears. One possibility in these cases might be for local authorities to seek to have amounts deducted from benefit and paid direct to the local authority to cover community charge payments and to pay off arrears."

That is an insight into the way in which the measure is likely to be administered between the two Departments.

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he accept that, if I believed that tonight we were discussing the issue of pensioners on supplementary benefit and those on low incomes being charged 20 per cent. of their rates, I would not hesitate to vote against the Government? I would do so if that was the specific issue, but is it really the issue? Surely the issue is that that cannot be done under the Bill without further legislation. The amendment is pre-empting something that may never happen. Therefore, if at some future time legislation were brought before the House to charge supplementary pensioners and those on low incomes 20 per cent. of their rates without any compensating increase in their income, I would vote against that. But the hon. Gentleman has not made out the case for me to vote for the Lords amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr. Meacher: I can be brief, as I see that time is going on. The hon. Gentleman raises the point that I am just coming to. If he really believes that the measure is not about cutting into the budgets of pensioners on supplementary benefit, among others, in a significant way, he is more credulous and gullible than I believe he is. It will have exactly that effect.

I refer to the Government's arguments. The Secretary of State talked about accountability. The Government want the measure to affect voting intentions. The Widdicombe report found that rate rebate claimants did regard themselves as ratepayers. There is no need to punish them so that they can see themselves in that light. Moreover, the fact remains that claimants are innocent bystanders in the Government's dispute with local authorities over rate levels. Wherever one stands on the rates question, which goes broader than what we are discussing tonight, it cannot be right to deploy as a tactic the threat of hardship to claimants. They are simply being used as pawns or weapons in the Government's fight with local authorities. Surely that is wrong.

The amendment from the other place is said to be defective. I do not believe that it is deficient; it is technically sound. It has certain incidental consequences.

[Mr. Meacher]

While claimants at or below the income support level are protected, the Secretary of State could still, if he so wished, impose the reduction above that level, thereby introducing an anomaly into the scheme. But one presumes that such anomalies would not be knowingly included in regulations. Indeed, the Government spokesman in another place said that that could happen only if the Secretary of State so wished. So I do not regard that as a justification for altering the amendment.

The Secretary of State said that certain other deductions are prevented, notably the non-dependant deductions. I believe that they are of dubious relevance anyway, because they apply only to housing benefit and not to mortgage interest tax relief. They also tend to discourage efficient use of housing stock. The Government could restore these non-dependant deductions if they wished without overturning the wider protection. That is the real point.

If there are deficiencies in the way that the amendment is drawn as it was finally decided in another place, these deficiencies can be put right within the terms of reference of preserving 100 per cent. coverage of rates for those on supplementary benefit, including pensioners. That would be completely acceptable to the Opposition. However, it is not acceptable for the amendment to be altered in a way that ensures that the 20 per cent. shortfall will be reintroduced. That must harm pensioners and others on supplementary benefit.

On those grounds, I strongly invite the House to reject this attempt to overturn the decision made in another place and to protect some of the poorest in our society.

Mrs. Currie: I am very glad to have this opportunity to put one or two matters right. First, I would like to tell the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that I believe that the personal circumstances of hon. Members are irrelevant. I consider his personal circumstances are irrelevant, even though he comes from a far wealthier background than I. I stress to the hon. Gentleman that I merely taught in a public school, whereas he went to one. If the hon. Gentleman's behaviour reflects the manners that he was taught in that public school, I wish that I had been there to teach him. He would not have come out of my classroom behaving and talking in the way he did.

Last week the Labour party very nearly lost an election on the issue of the personal circumstances of their candidate. If the Labour party wishes to indulge in such remarks against the Conservative party, Labour Members had better watch their own backs. They might find that the electorate begins to listen and calculates very carefully in regard to the people whom the Labour party puts up for election.

Mr. Stern: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her thoroughly well deserved comments against the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). Would my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Gentleman is smarting at the publicity in Private Eye today?

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) knows that, as soon as this debate has finished, I will go straight to the Library and find out what Private Eye says.

I deplore the implication that I am not capable of asking the hon. Member for Oldham, West a courteous question. The hon. Gentleman should know that I am never discourteous in the Chamber. Whatever I may do to the hon. Gentleman or to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) outside the House, I try to observe the rules in this House and he should do that as well. However, I do not indulge in synthetic indignation like the hon. Gentleman.

I would like to consider the amendment and the Government's view on this matter. The current system of local government finance is thoroughly unsatisfactory. There are wide differences in the rates that are charged and differences in the services available to people. There are also differences of geography and political philosophy. The position is simply not satisfactory.

I am not sure that any proposed change in the system would satisfy all the critics. Rates are a tax and there is no such thing as a fair tax. The only nice tax is a nil tax. However, if we had nil taxes we would not have the services that we need.

One of the methods to ensure that efficient services are provided is to use some form of pricing or charging system. In that context, the proposal that people should have to pay 20 per cent., or whatever figure is eventually written into the regulations, should be adopted.

I do not believe that services should be free. When I was responsible for community services in Birmingham as chairman of the social services committee, I insisted that we charged for basic services like home helps, meals on wheels, night watchers and day care for children. I thought that it was right and proper that we should charge for these services. We did not charge the full economic value, but we charged a figure that was related to that. If the economic costs rose, we considered increasing the cost and in many cases we did that.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): Can the hon. Lady tell us what happened if they could not pay? Did they receive no services?

Mrs. Currie: We found that in the case of certain services like the night watch, people were willing to pay. They were prepared to put money on one side to pay for that service. The result of this charging was extremely beneficial to the people concerned. We had some 20 per cent. of the budget available and as a result of the charges we brought in about £10 million on a budget of some £40 million, which we could then spend completely within our own control. The same principle applies to rates. These should also be seen as a charge for local services.

I have just ceased to be a councillor in Birmingham. The ward that I represented consisted of 55 per cent. council tenants and 45 per cent. other occupants.. Three quarters of the council tenants in the ward were on benefit of one kind or another. One does not need to be an arithmetical genius to work out that a significant minority of the people whom I represented were able substantially to ignore the rate proposed by the local authority. They did not need to pay attention to the results of their voting pattern. I am delighted to say that the people in my ward had incredible common sense. After I gave up my seat of 11 years, they elected another Tory. Indeed, they elected another woman, with a majority of 600. That was a bigger majority than I had 11 years ago on a bigger electorate and I believe that the ward is a darn sight more Tory now than it used to be.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West spoke about taking money from fuel bills to pay the rates. If that is the case, I am surprised that the Labour party ever backed the miners' strike. If Mr. Scargill had won, the costs of electricity would have shot through the roof. Instead of a cut of 3·5 per cent., electricity charges would have rocketed.

I want to put a serious point to the hon. Member for Oldham, West which arises out of the point that he made about the week-by-week effect which these proposals would have on the finances of the people concerned. I served on the Select Committee on Social Services when the Committee expressed concern about the problems of collecting very small bills week by week. The hon. Gentleman said that the effect would be to create bills of the order of some £3 a week. That is not a tiny sum. Therefore, the problem of lots of little bills flying around would diminish.

At the moment, I am dealing with a case in my constituency of a widow who was moved into a new bungalow. The bungalow has just been rated and her rates are £25 a week. Under the proposals we would be able to help her to the tune of £20 a week and she would have to find £5. That procedure is administratively straightforward and would deal with the Select Committee's objection about bills of that order. We have also found that the payment of small amounts for water rates, which are often paid weekly through the use of payment books, has proved to be no problem. The money is collected and the procedure is straightforward.

For these reasons, I am glad to support the Government and I hope that we will see the changes introduced so that people will think about their rates when they go to the ballot box in future.

Mr. Kirkwood: I would like to contribute a few brief remarks to the debate. I accept that there are problems about accountability because some local authorities have been acting in a profligate way. However, to achieve accountability by this route is completely unjustified. I cannot begin to support the proposal, whether it is hypothetical, pre-emptive, or whatever. It is right that the House should take and express forcibly a view about the proposal.

If the Government are thinking about increasing and improving local accountability, there is clearly an alternative available. They can change the electoral system. If there were a system of multi-member constituencies with a single transferable vote, the local electorate would be given the power to choose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that this has very much to do with Lords amendment No. 40.

Mr. Kirkwood: We are discussing local government accountability, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was arguing that there are ways of improving and increasing the level of accountability. That was the only point that I was trying to make. I will pass from it as there is not enough time to develop it further.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is a matter not of time but of order. The hon. Gentleman would be out of order if he sought to develop that point further. I hope that he will not do that.

Mr. Kirkwood: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My other objection, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), relates to the important question of hardship. There is no way that the proposal could be introduced without producing an unacceptable degree of hardship. I hope that when the House of Lords considers our scant debate this evening, it will continue to be resolute in its opposition which it voiced recently on the matter.

I do not believe that this proposal will work in any shape or form. Interestingly, the Secretary of State said that consultations were not complete. Yet the Secretary of State for Scotland is working on a Bill to introduce these very proposals for Scotland next Session. I was interested in the comments of the hon. Member for Oldham, West on the enforcement provisions being considered by the Department of the Environment. I hope that the Secretary of State will bear in mind that the situation in Scotland is even more urgent.

8 pm

Given the way in which the Government introduced the proposal and the Lords' reaction to it, it is entirely right that the House should support the position taken by their Lordships, and I hope that they will continue to maintain that position when the Bill returns to the other House.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): It is an important democratic concept that there should be no taxation without representation. I believe that the converse is also true — that there should not be representation without taxation.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Property votes.

Dame Jill Knight: One might use the word "reception" rather than representation. It is extremely important that people should understand that there is no Father Christmas and no golden tree which drops benefits upon the fortunate without payment. Under the present system, votes have been bought. That is immoral. I wonder what the Opposition would say if we bought votes by dishing out largesse as they do.

Mr. Michie: You do it all the time.

Dame Jill Knight: That is not true.

Mr. Raynsford: What about mortgage tax relief?

Dame Jill Knight: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, he is welcome to do so. I am not like the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher).

Mr. Raynsford: Would the hon. Lady deny the vote in parliamentary elections to people who do not pay tax because their incomes are too small?

Dame Jill Knight: I did not say that. The hon. Gentleman should listen more carefully. His suggestion is ridiculous. I am talking about rates.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Lady enunciated the principle that there should be no representation without taxation. I asked her to draw the analogy with elections to this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are dealing with the Social Security Bill. I hope that we can get back to it.

Dame Jill Knight: I will gladly follow your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

When things are made available totally free there is no understanding of their value. There must be a relationship of experience between the cost of meeting need and the need to meet the costs. Labour authorities lash out on endless benefits to people who never pay a penny. A girl being helped by Labour-controlled Islington council spent five months in 18 London hotels at a cost to the ratepayers of more than £4,000. She was not just placed in a bed-and-breakfast hotel — dear me, no! The social workers decided that she must be in a large, impersonal, good hotel, in which she was allowed unlimited use of the telephone and had £7 per day pocket money. That girl paid not a penny towards the cost of what she received. I am sorry, but I believe that that is wrong.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Member give way?

Dame Jill Knight: I will give way, but only briefly, as others wish to speak.

Mr. Corbyn: As the hon. Member has referred to my borough, she should allow me to comment. Islington borough council does not like putting people into bed-and-breakfast hotels. It chooses quality hotels where there is room for children to play and people can live decently. Islington and other authorities put people into bed-and-breakfast accommodation not because they wish to do so, but because of Government cuts in the housing programme and the Government's refusal to provide sufficient money to repair existing properties. None of that is the fault of the people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Dame Jill Knight: The hon. Gentleman does not listen. It was not bed-and-breakfast accommodation; it was expensive hotel accommodation.

Mr. Corbyn: In which they were given bed and breakfast.

Dame Jill Knight: No doubt that wounded the social workers all the way to the budget box because it was the ratepayers who had to pay for that largesse.

Mr. Corbyn: What largesse?

Dame Jill Knight: It was not bed-and-breakfast accommodation. A cost of £4,000 plus free phone calls and £7 per day pocket money is ridiculous. The hon. Gentleman should hang his head in shame at some of the things that Islington council has done. That girl was deliberately led to believe that money grew on trees. She did not have to pay and no one she knew had to pay. That is quite wrong.

Mr. Winnick: Is this an Adjournment debate on Islington?

Dame Jill Knight: There will be no understanding of the cost and no accountability unless the system is changed.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Member give way?

Dame Jill Knight: No. I have given way a great deal, and others wish to speak in the debate.

The more that local authorities spend on goodies, the more the lucky recipients will wish to keep the reckless spenders in office. That is wrong, too, because someone has to foot the bill, and the more the expenditure increases the greater the burden on the pockets of those who have to pay. Labour Members do not seem to realise that many people who pay rates are often much worse off than the people receiving all these benefits and there is great resentment among them when cases such as I have described are made public, because they have to foot the bill while the people who receive all the money pay nothing at all.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dame Jill Knight: I have given way twice and that is enough in a short speech.

The proposed cost for poorer households is very reasonable. We shall continue to pay 80 per cent. of the burden for those who find it hard to meet their rate bills. That is a very reasonable way to sort out the problem. Removing the assistance altogether would be another matter and I would vote against such a proposal, but we are talking about paying 80 per cent. out of the public purse. We are merely asking that people should understand that benefits cost money and that there is some relationship between what they receive and what they pay.

The Labour authorities are the big spenders.

Mr. Michie: They are the authorities that care.

Mr. Corbyn: And their rate support grant has been cut.

Dame Jill Knight: It is no use weeping crocodile tears. If Labour authorities were more careful in their spending, there would not be such hardship for ratepayers.

Mr. Corbyn: How much has Westminster city council spent on decorating the pavements?

Dame Jill Knight: The remedy lies in the authorities' own hands. For goodness sake, let us have some realism and understanding. I urge the House to support the amendment.

Mr. Raynsford From the comments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight), one would not suppose that we were discussing a proposal to cut benefit to 5 million or more households with a considerable saving for the Government. The proposal is about cuts, and the House of Lords has rightly rejected it on a number of grounds.

First, it is unfair because rate bills differ widely from one house and one area to another in a way that does not necessarily have anything to do with the political complexion of the local authority. Often it has more to do with the rateable value, when the property was last valued, the size of the property, and so on.

Dr. Godman: A 20 per cent. contribution to rates would fall especially hard on Scottish ratepayers because of the revaluation that the Government made in Scotland but dare not repeat south of the border, for obvious reasons.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He highlights yet another of the variations in rate bills which mean that the impact of the Government's proposal would cause greater hardship to people who, for whatever reason, are paying a high proportion of their income in rates.

The proposal would be administratively inefficient. In many areas, it will cost local authorities more to collect the money than they will be able to bring in. I remember the Minister for Social Security arguing in the House a few weeks ago about the proposal to cut housing benefit for students and saying that one of the reasons for the cut was that the administrative cost of paying out the benefit was so high as to make it not worth while. The Government are here proposing a system that would incur quite unnecessary but considerable extra administrative costs.

The proposal will cause hardship and suffering and a mounting burden of debt among people who are already burdened with debt. The Minister's arguments are threadbare. If he claims that there is no proposal to take 20 per cent. of the rates, why did he and his colleagues talk about it incessantly during the consultation period?

It being two hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion relating to the Social Security Bill (Allocation of Time), MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

No. 56, in page 42, line 34, leave out from "person" to end of line 36 and insert.

"who is liable to maintain the person by or on behalf of whom the application for the award was made or any person in relation to whose needs the award was made.

(8A) Subsections (3) to (6) of section 25 above have effect for the purposes of subsection (8)(c) above as they have effect for the purposes of sections 23 to 25 above."

No. 57, in page 43, line 9, leave out "general directions issued" and insert "regulations made".

No. 58, in page 43, line 13, at end insert—

"(11A) A person applying for a social fund payment may appeal to a social security appeal tribunal constituted in accordance with section 97(2) to (2E) of the Social Security Act 1975 against any determination of a social fund officer with respect to the application.

(11B) On an appeal under subsection (11A) above the appeal tribunal may—

(a) confirm the determination appealed against;

(b) substitute for that determination any other determination which a social fund officer could have made; or

(c) if the appeal is against a determination under subsection (3) or (4) above, set aside that determination."

Government motions to disagree with Lords amendments Nos. 57 and 58.

Government amendments in lieu of Lords amendment No. 58: (a), new clause—The social fund Commissioner—

'A.—(1) There shall be an officer to be known as the social fund Commissioner (in this section referred to as "the Commissioner.").

(2) The Commissioner shall be appointed by the Secretary of State.

(3) The Commissioner—

(a) shall appoint such social fund inspectors;

(b) may appoint such officers and staff for himself and for social fund inspectors, as he thinks fit, but with the consent of the Secretary of State and the Treasury as to numbers.

(4) Appointments under subsection (3) above shall be made from persons made available to the Commissioner by the Secretary of State.

(5) It shall be the duty of the Commissioner—

(a) to monitor the quality of decisions of social fund inspectors and give them such advice and assistance as he thinks fit to improve the standard of their decisions;

(b) to arrange such training of social fund inspectors as he considers appropriate; and

(c) to carry out such other functions in connection with the work of social fund inspectors as the Secretary of State may direct.

(6) The Commissioner shall report annually in writing to the Secretary of State on the standards of reviews by social fund inspectors and the Secretary of State shall publish his report.'.

(p), in page 59, line 16, at end insert

'and any social fund payments such as are mentioned in section 32(1A)(a) above'.

Mr. Newton: On Monday I set out in my statement to the House the view that had led to the social fund. Essentially, it is that the present single payment system is unsatisfactory and is becoming increasingly unworkable. That arises in part from a failure to distinguish sufficiently clearly between the two distinct roles of providing a basic weekly income and of meeting special emergency or one-off needs. The proposals in the Bill rest on that analysis, first, by creating a simpler, clearer structure for weekly income support and, secondly, by establishing a separate mechanism specifically designed to enable help with genuine, special, occasional needs to be given in a more practical, manageable, flexible way.

The first objective is unquestionably best met by precisely defined, closely regulated entitlement, with an appeal mechanism of the present type. That is a formal judicial structure which determines whether the law has been correctly applied in a particular case through adjudicating officers and appeal tribunals which we have improved and strengthened for that purpose.

The second objective is generally best met by a more discretionary approach operated on the basis of directions and guidelines rather than regulations so as to allow the application of a broader judgment to all the varied circumstances of individual cases. Just as we see this as a separate and distinct task, so we believe it requires its separate and distinct process of decision making through social fund officers and a different system of review.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): My hon. Friend will appreciate that for a system to appear to be fair there must be a degree of independence so that there is not automatically a bias towards either an applicant or the social fund. Justice must not only be done but must be seen to be done. Can he assure the House that an appellant can present his or her case at all levels on the procedure that he is proposing?

Mr. Newton: I shall come to the role that we see for the social fund commissioner, whom we have proposed in the amendment.

To ask the existing tribunals to perform this review role would be wrong from every point of view. If, in reviewing social fund decisions, they were to be subject to the directions and guidelines of the Secretary of State, the independence of their more clearly judicial role in applying regulations laid down by Parliament would be, and certainly could be, undermined. If they were not, they would in effect be acting as a second tier of discretionary decision making within no real framework. Either way, the inevitable tendency would be to build a body of case law which would risk recreating the very problems which have made the present system of regulated single payments so unsatisfactory.

As the House knows, our original proposals envisaged the first stage of review by the social fund officer, as indeed would be the case now with adjudicating officers. Beyond that we propose to review at a higher level within the normal management chain, with the applicant being given a further opportunity to put his case. In Committee we accepted that that alone might not be, and certainly might not be seen to be, sufficiently distanced from the original decision to be accepted as either fair or impartial.

Therefore, on Report we introduced proposals for a separate body of social fund inspectors, operating not only outside the local DHSS office, but outside and independent from the normal DHSS local office network and management. The inspector's role would be to establish whether the social fund officer had taken his decision properly — for example, whether it had been based on the proper evidence and in the light of all the facts. He would have power to confirm the determination made by a social fund officer, to make any determination which a social fund officer could have made—in other words, to substitute his determination—or to refer the matter back to the social fund officer for determination.

In debate in the other place and in the amendments that have come to this House as a result, the argument has been carried forward in two closely linked ways. First, directions, not guidelines, would be turned into regulations. Secondly, decisions, whether under the regulations as proposed or the guidelines, would be subject to appeal to the social security appeal tribunals.

For the reasons I have sought to give, we do not feel able to ask the House to accept the amendments. We wish to make a further clear and significant response to the concerns that underlie them. We seek to do that in three ways — partly through the amendments and partly through an earlier amendment.

[Mr. Newton]

The first is the community care amendment — the severe disablement premium — that we discussed earlier. As I said in that debate, we had intended that those needs should be met on a discretionary basis through the social fund. By creating the new severe disablement premium, which is decided on by adjudication officers and appeal tribunals in the normal way and is a part of the regulated entitlement of the income support scheme, we have responded to some of the concern expressed on that aspect of the social fund.

8.30 pm

Secondly, we have concluded that the proposed maternity and funeral payments should be put on a regulated basis and that decisions should be taken by normal adjudication officers, subject to the normal appeal machinery. In the case of community care reflected in the severe disablement premium and maternity and funeral payments, which are undoubtedly sensitive areas about which many hon. Members are concerned, we propose to put the entitlement into regulations. They will be decided by adjudication officers, and will be subject to the normal process of appeal.

Thirdly, for those decisions that would remain subject to the discretionary process on the basis of directions and guidelines, we propose an amendment to entrench the independence of the social fund inspectors in the role that they are assigned by the Bill.

Dr. Godman: Will the inspectorate have a career structure of its own? Will the inspectorate be independent of the general career structure of the Department? Will the inspectors be of a more senior rank than those whose decisions they may overturn?

Mr. Newton: As to those questions—particularly the last one—we should wish to discuss the matter with the social fund commissioner after his appointment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to proceed.

We propose to establish the post of a social fund commissioner building on the well-established pattern—I think that it is widely accepted as valid—represented by the existing chief adjudication officer regarding the regulated part of the system.

The chief adjudication officer has his own specific position in the legislation and is statutorily independent of the Secretary of State. Our amendment proposes a social fund commissioner, similarly with his own position written into the legislation, and statutorily independent of the Secretary of State in his work—in this case, the work is to appoint the inspectors and their staff, to ensure that they are given appropriate training, and to monitor the quality of their decisions.

I shall make a further important point, because it completes, in some respects, the parallel with the chief adjudication officer. It will be within the memory of several hon. Members—certainly the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) — that we responded to argument on earlier legislation—I think that it was the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act; commonly called the 1983 HASSASSA Act — by requiring the chief adjudication officer to produce an annual report to the Secretary of State which the Secretary of State should have a duty to publish. We propose to match that requirement on the chief adjudication officer and the Secretary of State with a parallel requirement regarding the proposed social fund commissioner.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: My hon. Friend has talked about the duties of the commissioner for monitoring the quality of decisions. Will the commissioner, if he thinks fit, be able to consider individual cases and make decisions?

Mr. Newton: The social fund commissioner should satisfy himself that the standards maintained by the inspectors are proper and fair, and that they operate in a reasonable manner. He will be concerned with the quality control of those working the system, and not with taking separate decisions himself.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Can the Minister say what the net costs of the appeal arrangements are expected to be? Will new staff be appointed, or will the appointments be made from existing staff? Will the appeal arrangements be on a district or a regional basis?

Mr. Newton: The latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question would need further discussion with the commissioner and further development as we work out the proposals. We have brought forward proposals in response to quite legitimate expressions of opinion by Members of both Houses of Parliament. It is clear, from the amendment, that the social fund inspectors should be appointed from staff made available by the Secretary of State. Their responsibility as social fund inspectors would be to the social fund commissioner, in the same way as is familiar in the adjudicated side of the system.

The social fund is not simply an attempt to return single payments to discretionary form. Hon. Members opposite have found that difficult to accept. It is designed as, and we hope it will be, a new approach to what has been a difficult and intractable problem under successive Governments, and one more appropriate than that which we have at present to the meeting of genuine special needs. It requires a system of review, specifically related to the new approach. In those areas that lend themselves to regulated entitlement, such as maternity and funeral payments, as well as community care, we have met the needs of the other place and the consequent case for the normal system of adjudication and appeal.

In those areas where discretion remains, and where we believe that it must remain if we are to have the flexibility to look at individual special circumstances as they should be considered, we have responded by establishing a clear new safeguard for the independence and integrity of the appropriate process of review. Taken together, I believe that those steps constitute, as with the earlier amendment on community care, a real and significant move to meet the wishes that were expressed in another place.

Mrs. Beckett: The Secretary of State said that we had enjoyed listening to the discussions on the Bill for about 200 hours. It seems to me that during most of that time we have listened to Government Ministers saying, "We are thinking about that, we are considering that, we are discussing that with people, and we have not made up our minds."

In many ways, the speech by the Minister for Social Security was quite remarkable. Two thirds of the way through he said that it was not acceptable to the Government to include in the Bill the amendments passed in another place because it would be wrong for appeals to go to tribunals and for them to be decided as a result of directions by the Secretary of State. He said that it would make the system unworkable if tribunals acted on directions rather than on regulations. Later, he said that the amendments proposed that the tribunals should act on regulations and not on directions. He then applied the argument for the first case to the second, to which it is clearly not applicable.

There is nothing wrong with the amendments; it is just that the Government do not like them. It is clear that the Government's alternative proposals are not exactly stringent in their application. I was fascinated when, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), the Minister could not tell us not only whether there would be a separate career structure for the inspectors, but whether they would be of senior rank to those whose decisions they were reviewing, which may cast some light on the authority that he expects them to exercise.

There are problems with some of the Government's amendments, especially amendment (c), which goes further than the original Bill and which we find unacceptable. It is right for me to deal with the principal problem to which the amendments are directed — the Government's proposals to withdraw, through the Bill, rights of independent appeal that have existed for 50 years. The Government's reason for doing so is contemptible. They realise only too well that if applications are to be made for items that cannot be paid for out of weekly benefit, and those applications are to be judged on their merit, as they must be in an independent appeal, the cash limits which the Government ultimately intend to introduce will not hold. I say that with confidence, because we shall later discuss the paving proposals for the social fund by which the Government are clearly halving the already inadequate assistance now given. The scheme cannot be so severely restricted if need is to be properly weighed.

For the Government to dismiss cursorily a half-century-long civil right in their search for economy is widely considered to be a constitutional outrage. That view was clearly held by those in another place—many of them with a wealth of experience in these matters—and obviously led to the amendments that we are debating. That was also the strongly held view of the Council on Tribunals, a body which, so far as I am aware, has never before ventured into the area of political controversy, but which was so horrified by the Government's proposals that it denounced them in uncompromising terms and expressed its "grave concern" in a special report addressed to this subject alone.

It is widely accepted that the quality of decision-making is affected by the existence of an independent system of appeal. No one believes that it is an accident that, in so many cases in which an appeal is sought, and the case papers are therefore re-examined, decisions are overturned on review alone, without the full process of appeal. That happened in about 19,000 cases in 1984. An additional 8,000 decisions in that year where review had confirmed the original decision were overturned on appeal. That means that at least 8,000, and possibly up to 27,000, people received payments to which they were entitled in law, but which they received only because of the existence of an independent appeal system.

The first annual report of the Chief Adjudication Officer, as the head of the service in which these decisions are made, stated that DHSS officers make decisions

"on scanty evidence on the assumption that claimants will complain or appeal" and that

"the standard of adjudication cannot objectively be regarded as satisfactory".

The Council on Tribunals points out:

"such a high proportion of incorrect decisions is most unlikely to be improved, even using specially trained officers to the extent where the need for independent tribunals became questionable".

The Government suggest that they have made concessions, but that is less than accurate. They have not made concessions in the case for independent appeal, except in respect of maternity and funeral payments. The Government have tried to find cosmetic cover to make an internal system of appeal sound independent. They refer to inspectors and to a commissioner, but a brief glance at Government amendment (a) blows the gaff and certainly calls into question the Minister's remarks.

The Minister referred to the commissioner as "statutorily independent", but proposed subsection (4) in Government amendment (a) states:

"appointments under subsection (3) above shall be made from persons made available to the Commissioner by the Secretary of State."

Some independence!

The Minister suggested that the commissioner would be concerned only with "quality control" of the system. I have no idea what he meant by that, and I doubt that he has. The inspectors and the commissioner are all to be responsible to, and in practice chosen by, the Secretary of State. They will not be, and will be seen not to be, independent. There will rightly be no confidence that each case will be judged on its merits, because cases will not be considered solely on their merits. The Government's amendments continue to fail the common test of justice. This injustice will be inflicted on those described by the Government's own Social Security Advisory Committee as "the most vulnerable" people in our society.

The Opposition are, of course, glad that the maternity and funeral payments will be judged in an independent procedure, but this highlights the truth of our argument. The Government have always stated that these payments would not be subject to cash limits and so, on these measures, fair dealing could be allowed.

There is nothing defective about the amendments. They seek merely to remedy an injustice which the Government seek to impose. The Opposition agree wholeheartedly with the Lords amendments. We hope that the other place will stand by its guns and see through the device of the Government's amendments as clearly as will the unfortunate claimants who otherwise will be subjected to these procedures.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: I shall detain the House only briefly to make a few comments on the proposed new clause. I am deeply disappointed with it. Unfortunately, the grand title of "social fund Commissioner" is far too grand for what the commissioner has to do and for his powers. I shall consider the proposed new clause subsection by subsection.

It is, of course, reasonable that the commissioner

"shall be appointed by the Secretary of State",

[Mr. Andrew Bowden]

but after that, in his activities, responsibilities and powers, he is bound hand and foot by the Secretary of State. Subsection (3) states that the commissioner

"(a) shall appoint such social fund inspectors;
(b) may appoint such officers and staff for himself and for social fund inspectors, as he thinks fit, but with the consent of the Secretary of State and the Treasury".

We might just as well say that the commissioner can appoint anyone he likes, so long as that person is on the list supplied by the Secretary of State.

8.45 pm

What are the commissioner's duties? The great disappointment is that the commissioner, so far as I understand from the reply by my hon. Friend, will not have the power to look at individual cases. He will "monitor the quality of decisions".

I do not understand what that means. Will the commissioner look collectively at all the decisions made in a particular matter by the social fund inspectors and say that they were all wrong, or all right, or that some were right and some were wrong? This is a cosmetic exercise.

Subsection (6) states that the commissioner

"shall report annually in writing to the Secretary of State"

that is good—

"and the Secretary of State shall publish his report."

I am deeply disappointed that the commissioner has no real powers, that he is not an ombudsman and that there is no independent tribunal. In the context of the way in which our social security system has worked for a long time, it is sad that a degree of independence has been removed.

Mr. Kirkwood: I strongly subscribe to the arguments of the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden). The scheme has been ill-thought-out and will eventually be shown to be so. The proposals as they stand show no real element of independence. The Minister for Social Security knows that he is in difficulty with the other place. This is an attempt to get him off the hook. I hope that, even if this measure is passed with the use of the Whips here, the other place will not accept it.

The proposed new clause refers to a "social fund Commissioner". That is an especially cruel use of the word "commissioner". The proposal tries to invest this new official creature with the considerable authority and independence of the commissioners in the existing independent appeal system. That amounts to political sleight of hand. The two are in no way analogous.

The real independence of the proposed new commissioner is highly questionable. I do not believe that they will really have the power to overturn decisions taken by inspectors. At the end of the day, someone has to take the decision. There is a power to review. The commissioner may say that he wants to change a decision. The social fund inspector may say, "That is all very well, but I think that my decision is right." What will then happen? Obviously, there is no change in the application of the guidelines, which means, indirectly, no change in the cash limits faced by the social fund inspectors and the social fund commissioner. That is not acceptable.

The fact that the review will be taken in-house means that the social fund inspectors will have less stringent and effective powers of oversight. The present panoply of genuinely independent appeals will be missing in the future. Do claimants have a right of audience before the social fund inspector? If not, the whole system is vitiated. That aspect must be considered.

As I understand it, the social fund inspector will be based at a regional office. My regional office is 55 miles away from the local office. If people are to be sent traipsing from Galashiels to Edinburgh for a right of appeal, that will be an entirely regressive and detrimental move.

The Government's amendment talks about publishing a report. I welcome that as far as it goes. Of course, those reports will not be debatable in Parliament. They will be published and go into the ether. It may make interesting reading to see how the reports are handled, but they will not be debated in the House. We should look at that aspect carefully.

This whole matter should be taken essentially on the basis of a question of justice. The Council on Tribunals was right. Although there are some welcome improvements, which the Minister explained, they do not go far enough for me to recommend my right hon. and hon. Friends to support this amendment.

One of the great strengths of the appeal system as we now know it is that decisions are published and people can understand what is going on during the review that takes place under the normal process. Will claimants be given a clear explanation as to how their case was dealt with under the proposed system? Will the key decisions in the reviews be made available more publicly and generally by the Department? It is important for us to be able to measure exactly how the system will work.

These proposals do not go nearly far enough. This is nothing like the independent system that we would support. I recommend my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Government's proposals.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): One can well understand and fully support the Government's determination not to introduce the full panoply of a quasi judicial appeal procedure such as we have at present. To deal with thousands and thousands of possible claims about small items will require a procedure which is cumbersome, long-winded, expensive, absurd at the margins and cannot be entirely fair and just to those who seek to appeal against decisions. I say that it is absurd at the margins because much time, effort, money and bureaucracy can often be involved in whether somebody should have a hot water bottle, a saucepan, or whatever. Therefore, one can fully understand that one does not wish to have——

Mrs. Beckett: I am listening with interest to the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Does my memory fail me or was it the hon. Gentleman who served on a Committee last year when his hon. Friend the Minister instituted this very judicial system? The hon. Gentleman enthusiastically welcomed it and his hon. Friend the Minister took credit for the Government making the system more judicial at the time.

Mr. Galley: That is not the case. That is not what happened last year. If that point is in any way valid, the hon. Lady should have made it long ago because this is a debate that we have had in Committee over a long period. Let me come to what I sought to persuade the Government to do.

One can fully understand that this long-winded procedure, which is not necessarily going to produce good decisions, should not be implemented. Nevertheless, concern has been expressed by many hon. Members on both sides of the House about the need for some form of appeal mechanism. The system, as initially proposed, meant that particular individuals had enormous power and responsibility. Therefore, it was crucial that there was some movement towards an appeal procedure. It should not be the case that one person made the decision and that was the end of the matter.

Therefore, after much debate in Committee and on Report, it was accepted, before the measure went to another place, that there should be an internal review procedure. That meant the possibility of social fund officers reviewing their own decisions, passing those decisions on to other social fund officers and having an inspectorate to monitor the decisions and to which people could appeal. That allayed some of the fears. It meant that there was a second opinion. That was an important concession.

When one looked at the new—[Interruption.] If hon. Gentlemen want to make comments, would they not make them from a sedentary position?

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman may not be able to recall last year. However, does he recall the Committee on this Bill in which he was in the vanguard for reforms which would strengthen the appeal system?

Mr. Galley: Yes, indeed. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the Committee proceedings he will see that the remarks I have made this evening are precisely in tune with what I said during those debates. I said that there had to be a review procedure, and we got a concession towards an internal management review system. The hon. Gentleman should wait until I come to my further point.

With the Government's proposal, we now have the idea of a social fund commissioner. One looks at that and thinks, "Good, we are getting a little further. We will have a social fund ombudsman." That was my first thought. That would have been a good idea. It is important that there should be consistency in decisions in different parts of the country and that the quality of those decisions should be the same in varying circumstances. We should have a quality control mechanism through the social fund commissioner.

However, this is a lost opportunity in not extending the function of the social fund commissioner to an appeal of last resort. It may be that one would need to institute some control upon the range of such appeals, but it would give a further element of independence.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I had the pleasure of serving on the Committee with my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). I was under the impression that my hon. Friend was advocating that there should be monitoring of the performance of the inspectorate, and that is what we have now.

Mr. Galley: My hon. Friend is right. We have agreed on an internal review procedure which is a plus point, and we how have a monitoring of consistency, which is another plus point. All I am suggesting is that we must resist the Lords amendment. I fully support my hon. Friend the Minister in that. However, he may have missed an opportunity to have an appeal of last resort in a social fund commissioner. He could have gone just one step further.

Mr. Winnick: I am pleased that the other place recognised the importance of continuing an appeals system, which has operated in social security matters for over 50 years. It is interesting to note that the figures show that, between 1981 and 1984, over 25,000 decisions about single payments were challenged by tribunals on appeal. I hope that the Minister will take this on board.

It is important to bear in mind that not only does the system allow an appeal to be made, and many are successful, but decisions are affected by an appeals system. Once a decision has been made and a claimant is dissatisfied and intends to lodge an appeal, the matter is reviewed before the appeal. That is bound to have an effect. It is not likely to continue under the proposed system set out in the Government's new clause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) mentioned the Council on Tribunals but, because of time, did not quote from what it said. However, I shall do so, because what it said is of the utmost importance. The Council on Tribunals is rarely mentioned in connection with these issues. It said:

> "Very good reasons are needed before the abolition of the right to an independent appeal in such circumstances, an appeal which has existed for over 50 years. It would probably be the most substantial abolition of a right of appeal to an independent tribunal since the Council on Tribunals was set up by Parliament in 1958 following the Franks report. It is for these reasons that we are so critical of the proposal. In our last Annual Report we described it as highly retrograde".

That view comes not just from the Opposition but from the Council on Tribunals.

9 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): The Council on Tribunals has an axe to grind. Has it not been made clear that the resources in the social fund are finite? Is it not better for the social fund to be directed towards those in real need rather than lining the pockets of those who sit on appeal tribunals, the secretariat and Uncle Tom Cobbleigh and all?

Mr. Winnick: To a large extent, the hon. Gentleman has given away the reason why there will be no appeal system. He has said frankly what the Minister was reluctant to say. It will be a highly cash limited social fund, the purpose of which is to limit and reduce the amount of money being given — hence no appeals system. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman because his intervention was useful.

What is contained in the new clause is no satisfactory alternative to an independent appeals system. The social fund officer will be based in the local office, so he will be in the very office where the decision was first taken against which an appeal is being made. Although the social fund inspector will not be based in the local office, he will be based in the regional office and will be perceived, inevitably, as part of the internal DHSS procedure.

As the new clause says, in the main — perhaps without exception—such inspectors will come from the existing DHSS staff. Does anyone believe, or could they come to accept, that this will be an independent review that will be a satisfactory alternative to the existing system of independent appeal?

I ask questions that I have asked before. Will claimants be seen in the first place by a social fund officer?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman made a curious remark about the fact that the social fund inspectors may come from within the DHSS staff. Is he saying that the adjudication officers, who do the same, do not accurately and properly carry out their functions, because that is the logical conclusion of his remarks?

Mr. Winnick: To some extent, my analogy is with the system of appeals in immigration, with which I am familiar. Although the adjudicators are appointed by the Home Office, it is recognised that they are independent, and that is an important difference. It is important that there should be an understanding, a recognition and an acceptance that the people concerned are independent. I do not believe for one moment that the social fund inspectors will be seen in that light.

Will people who say that they are dissatisfied with a decision see the social fund inspector in person? Many of the people with whom we are dealing may not feel adequately able to present their cases. Will they be in a position to go and see the social fund officer, or will such matters be dealt with through paperwork? We must not forget that, under the existing appeals system, people can be represented.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that, as the terms of reference for the social fund commissioners are so vague, the only thing that can logically happen is that, as the many discrepancies on decisions of social fund officers arise, cases will end up in the court as a matter of natural justice?

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend is right.

It is understandable that, with the tainted record of Ministers trying to lessen the amount of money given to the poorest in our community, who desperately need the payments for which they can apply, there is so much suspicion of what is being done. That is why we are justified, like the other place, in voting against the Government's proposal and in believing that the appeal system should continue.

This is a further onslaught on the poor—on those who desperately need the items for which they have applied. The speeches by Conservative Members in previous debates and also in this debate demonstrate what was said a few moments ago: that they believe that the assistance that is being given should be reduced and that the poorest should be further discriminated against and penalised. The policy of this Tory Government is to give to the rich and to take away from those who are most in need.

Mr. Evennett: The social fund came in for a great deal of scrutiny in Standing Committee. Two matters caused concern to hon. Members. Certain hon. Members were in favour of a full appeals procedure, with all the bureaucracy that that entails. Other hon. Members felt that there should be a monitoring system to ensure that inspectors are doing their job correctly. That concern in Committee has been removed to a large degree by the new clause.

Conservative Members welcome the creation of a commissioner who will be responsible for ensuring that inspectors perform their job well. Conservative Members welcome most of all the fact that his report will be published, for it will then be possible to monitor his comments on the system. We do not want a return to the kind of bureaucracy which would result in appeals over minor matters being dealt with at great length. That does not help claimants, or administrators or taxpayers, who have to foot the bill.

I welcome the movement that the Government have made since the Committee stage. Also, I welcome the fact that they have taken on board the concern of some hon. Members about the monitoring of the social fund. The new clause is a vast improvement and it should be supported. We look forward to this radical Bill, which is long overdue, being placed on the statute book.

Mr. Frank Field: I should like to make four points in one minute. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said that tonight the Government have made the crucial point that they are willing to concede independent appeals only to those parts of the scheme that are not cash limited.

Secondly, the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) made, as so often happens in these debates, a most pertinent contribution. He said that the use of the word "commissioner" in this context is a sham and that it will be seen to be a sham.

Thirdly, the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) said that such items as saucepans, clothing and bedding are small items and are of little importance. They may be of little importance to hon. Members, but to all too many of our constituents they are crucial ingredients for a decent standard of living.

Fourthly, even though, with his usual ability, the Minister used his silver tongue to move the amendment, he convinced us all that, if we were asked to write a minute on the working of the new system, if we were honest, we could not do it.

Dr. Godman: The concept of a commissioner is somewhat ambiguous, despite the welcome that has been given to it by the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett). It is an unknown quantity. Is the commissioner to become a social welfare ombudsman, or is he or she to be simply a chief inspector, or Government inspector? In some ways, the role is analogous to the lay observer in the Scottish legal system. Will he or she be a career civil servant, or will he or she be a member of the Department itself and hence part of the Department's career structure? Is it likely that the successful applicant will be recruited from outwith the Department? Will the commissioner have legal training? Is it likely that he or she will be a Queen's counsel? To my mind, none of those matters is at all clear from what the Minister said when introducing the concept of a commissioner.

The Minister knows the importance of single payments in Scotland vis-a-vis the rest of Great Britain. It is essential for us to have an independent appeals system and this shadowy vague animal, this commissioner, whoever he or she may be, will simply not be good enough for the people I represent. Despite the inefficiencies and the deficiencies of the single payment system, at the moment those people, at least at the back of their minds, trust an independent appeals system. This shadowy commissioner will not be able to earn the trust of people who depend on social welfare incomes in Scotland and in the rest of Great Britain.

Mr. Newton: The missing ingredient in the debate is the failure to acknowledge that the system we have is simply not working. In part, that is because of the nature of the system.

It being four hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion relating to the Social Security Bill (Allocation of Time), MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to Order this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Question agreed to.

Lords amendment accordingly disagreed to.

MR. SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to, some with Special Entry.

Lords amendment: No. 58, in page 43, line 13, at end insert—

"(11A) A person applying for a social fund payment may appeal to a social security appeal tribunal constituted in accordance with section 97(2) to (2E) of the Social Security Act 1975 against any determination of a social fund officer with respect to the application.

(11B) On an appeal under subsection (11A) above the appeal tribunal may—

(a) confirm the determination appealed against;

(b) substitute for that determination any other determination which a social fund officer could have made; or

(c) if the appeal is against a determination under subsection (3) or (4) above, set aside that determination."—[Mr. Newton.]

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment—[Mr. Fowler.]

Supplementary Benefit

9.26 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Supplementary Benefit (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 1259), dated 18th July 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st July, be annulled.

We have tabled this prayer for three reasons. First, the proposals involve a cut in single payments of between £150 million and £200 million. I have based that on the figure that the Minister gave in his statement two days ago, when he referred to a current rate of £400 million. There is, therefore, a cut of something over 45 per cent. in expenditure on single payments, regardless of need, despite the increased number of those dependent on supplementary benefit. We believe that that must cause intense and widespread hardship.

Until now, it has always been accepted that the supplementary benefit scale rates are fixed at so low a level on the assumption that expenditure on major household items must be met separately. Indeed, many believe that the cut in expenditure is an attempt to accustom claimants and others to the limits under a future social fund. We believe that these regulations give us an insight into the sort of conditions that will exist under the social fund when the Bill is enacted.

Secondly, we object to the regulations because the new rules are extremly complex. Any hon. Member who reads the draft regulations will see what I mean. Moreover, they are contrary to the Government's stated aim on social security policy, which is to simplify administration. As a result, there is likely to be confusion, hardship and a low take-up, even among those who are entitled to benefit.

Thirdly, we object to the regulations on the ground of procedure. We are extremely disturbed about the manner in which the regulations have been tabled, with little or no time for hon. Members and outside organisations to consult on the response made by the Social Security Advisory Committee to the Government's proposals before today's debate and implementation on 11 August. Indeed, implementation is less than three weeks' time. Thus, we have yet another example of the Government's precipitate and indecent haste to put these measures into operation.

The Government sat on the highly critical report of the SSAC on these proposals for two months. The committee's report is dated 22 May. Yet only three weeks have been allowed for claimants and staff to find out about these complex changes. In the middle of the holiday period, it is totally unreasonable for DHSS staff to be expected to master these new complex rules in time to apply them by 11 August. The staff are already struggling to cope with what the Secretary of State referred to recently as the major operational burdens that the present scheme places upon them. Claimants are even less likely now to find out about the changes before the axe falls on 11 August. The Opposition believe—I say this advisedly — that this is a deliberate ploy to prevent people claiming their entitlement while they still can.

The problem, as the Government see it, is one of rising costs. The Minister shakes his head, but he will be able to speak in due course, and no doubt shortly. That was very much in evidence in what he said two days ago, when he spoke a great deal about exploitation and abuse. There is evidence, however, of a bottomless pit of need which is fed by rising unemployment, the growing number of claimants who have been unemployed for two or three years, the gradual erosion of other resources, such as savings, and the inadequate levels of weekly benefit payments.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): On Monday, my hon. Friend the Minister talked about leaflets circulating throughout the country containing tick lists under the slogan "closing down sales". He said that during the four weeks to 3 June there had been claims amounting to an annual rate of 5·5 million payments involving at least £400 million. It is no coincidence that these leaflets appeared throughout the country. Who was behind that smash-and-grab raid? Was it the Labour party? Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House here and now?

Mr. Meacher: I am sure that the House will be interested to know who is behind the smash-and-grab raid of tax cuts for some of the highest-paid people in the country.

Mr. Favell: Answer my question. Who is behind it?

Mr. Meacher: If individual Tories pay accountants to ensure that they receive all the reliefs to which they are entitled, why should not welfare rights officers, on behalf of poor people, obtain benefits for their clients to which they are entitled? These are benefits to which they have a right under legislation. The Government pretend at least that they wish there to be a high take-up rate and that benefits should be paid to those who are entitled to receive them.

Grants for exceptional needs are precisely that. Proving need is a basic condition before claims can be made and they are not paid without proof of need. That is set out in the regulations. The Minister has spoken of grants running at £400 million annually and the Government have said that they will return to the 1984 level, which will be entirely arbitrary now that we are in 1986. The effect of that move will be a reduction from £400 million to £216 million. That is a cut of about £190 million, not the £100 million that the Minister talked about originally.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): The figures that I used on Monday were based on one month's figures, which were the four weeks to 3 June. They reflect in part the astonishing activities that are taking place throughout the country, some of which I referred to on Monday and to which I shall refer again this evening. The plain and blunt fact is that currently it is difficult for us to know what the position is on single payments.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Government are in charge.

Mr. Newton: We are in charge, and we believe that the present torrent of claims could cause the breakdown of the entire social security system. That is why we are taking action.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister's last remark, when he was under some pressure, is significant. He is saying that when people claim their rights, which they are entitled to do under legislation which applies to the social security system, the system is in danger of breaking down completely. It is an astonishing claim to make. The fact is that those welfare rights claims are purely to ensure that people get what the House has said they are entitled to claim. It is the Government who should be ensuring that they get that and we should not need to depend on welfare rights officers, financed by various voluntary organisations.

Mr. Frank Field: Did my hon. Friend notice the condemnation from Conservative Benches of voluntary organisations issuing leaflets with check lists of items to which people may be entitled? Will he remind Conservative Members who initiated that process? Is he not aware that earlier in this Parliament, with the cut in staff, the Government themselves started sending leaflets to old people, asking them to tick off items to which they may be entitled? Surely one is just learning from what the Government themselves have done.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend makes an effective point. That is true. One section of the population that is in need, about which the Government are concerned, is the elderly —purely because of their numbers, one suspects. They have employed those methods to ensure that some elderly people get more benefit, but as soon as it is lone parents, the unemployed, or single unemployed persons claiming benefit, the Government strongly object. But they all have rights under the legislation. It is wrong to suggest that the social security system depends on a massive failure to take up benefits. That shows what a charade it is in the minds of some Conservative Members.

I wish to refer to the reasons advanced by the Government in a statement that they made two or three days ago to justify the measure. First, the Government see an inequity between those who are on supplementary benefit and those who are not. That is an odd argument because it was the Conservative Government in 1980, when the social security rules were changed, who removed entitlement to lump sum grants from those not on supplementary benefit and not in full-time work. They are now using that removal to withdraw the right to such grants from others. In other words, one chips away part of the edifice and, when one sees an inequity, one chips away at another part. If there is an inequity between the low paid and supplementary benefit claimants, surely the answer lies in improving the position of the low paid rather than further worsening that of supplementary benefit claimants.

The second argument used by the Government was the increased value of the scale rates since 1979, which they say reduce the need for single payments. However, the scale rate takes no account of the differential impact of price increases on the poor. I do not know whether the Government accept the low-paid price index, which was developed by the Low Pay Unit and the Civil and Public Services Association. Perhaps they do not. But it is a significant and carefully controlled independent effort to arrive at a fairer retail prices index for the low paid. On that basis, there has been not an increase in the rates, but a 1 per cent. cut in the value of the rates. However, another point is relevant. The Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations set out a claimant's weekly requirements to be covered in the scale rates. They do not include an amount towards major items of household equipment and furniture. That is what we are talking about.

The third argument concerns the increased number of single payments that have been made since 1981. I was surprised by the figures quoted by the Government until I looked into the matter more carefully. The fact is that 1981 is a deceptive base line for comparison because it was the first year of the new social security scheme in which single payments were set out in regulations. Neither the public nor many DHSS staff knew the rules. In that year, single payments as a proportion of the number of claimants were at their lowest level since 1971. For that reason, it is scarcely surprising that we saw the results that we did.

Two other arguments to which the Government and Conservative Members have referred tonight relate to the welfare rights take-up campaigns. It is extraordinary that Conservative Members should make so much of that. In effect, the Government have said that they introduced rights to single payments in 1980, but, now that people are exercising those rights, thanks to the efforts of local councils to improve take-up, those rights will be curtailed. A right is acceptable to Conservative Members as long as it is not taken up by too many people. The omens are ominous for future attempts to improve take-up of benefits. That raises serious questions about the Government's commitment to decent levels of benefit. It suggests that the Government support the means test because they know that there will be substantial underclaiming.

The implication is that people do not really need the single payments that they are claiming. A recent academic study into the matter was carried out by Berthoud and that study was much quoted in Committee. Berthoud states:

> "There has been a massive and continuing increase in the number of payments made especially for bedclothes, furniture and a range of household goods. This is not an artificial demand by claimants who have learned how to obtain extra money. The need for household items was there all the time and is only now beginning to be met."

I am sure that Berthoud is absolutely correct. All that local take-up campaigns have done is to attempt to make a reality of the right that claimants were promised in 1980. That is a job that the Government should undertake.

The examples that the Government have given of abuse involve ways in which claimants get round the regulations regarding entitlement to clothing grants. I would be the first to admit that there is some abuse in this system, as in any system involving money, whether it be tax, bus fares or whatever. The so-called abuse of clothing grant regulations is a reflection of the absurdly restrictive regulations. The Government have always refused to admit that the 1980 reforms involved a severe cut in clothing grants. The Minister looks doubtful, but I can tell him that between 1978 and 1981 the number of grants dropped from 137 per 1,000 claimants to 15 per 1,000 claimants. Such extraordinary attempts are made to get round the regulations because there is a great need for clothing and almost no help is now given.

Berthoud also states:

> "The evidence suggests strongly that claimants are not in a position to exploit the rules by making unmerited claims and it is clear that the needs being met by single payments are genuine."

None of the Government's arguments holds water. We are back to the simple, stark, crude but real aim behind the proposals, and that is to save another £150 million to £200 million at the expense of poor people, in addition to the £300 million which has already been lopped off by the vote taken a few hours ago.

The supplementary benefit scale rates have always been fixed at a level so low that they were never intended to pay for major household items such as furniture, bedding, cookers and clothes. Yet that is what will now happen. The effect of the measure must be to force many poor families to go without these essential household items or to drive them deeper into poverty and debt. Either way, to do that, on this day of all days is especially offensive and we totally reject the regulations.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I begin by reminding the House of the basic facts that I put to the House on Monday, without going back as far as the last Labour Government, who were also concerned about the growth in this area.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) clearly misunderstood. There was no reference whatever to 1981, so all his remarks about using a false base were entirely irrelevant. I said in my statement that, comparing 1979 with 1983, the number of payments virtually doubled to almost 2 million and that expenditure almost quadrupled to more than £140 million. By 1985, both figures had more than doubled again, to more than 4 million payments at a cost of more than £300 million, and the growth shows no sign of diminishing. Whatever else may be said about those figures, I did not use what I acknowledge would have been the low base year of 1981. Indeed, my previous sentence covered the 1981 position by saying that the measures that we took in 1980 appeared to have had some success.

I shall not repeat all that I said on Monday, but the points that I made then are in no way shaken by what the hon. Member for Oldham, West has said today. The trend cannot be explained merely by the increase in the number of claimants, because the rate of payment per claimant has itself doubled since 1979. I made it clear that, apart from the real increase in weekly benefit levels, there have been specific improvements — for example, in some of the scale rates for children, in the rate of additional heating payments, especially for pensioners, and in the rules governing the payment of benefit, especially at the long-term rate, for lone parents and for the sick and the disabled. That has also brought about a substantial improvement in the amount that people receive, especially at certain periods. We estimate very roughly that the total effect of the changes in benefit rates that we have made over the period is probably about £250 million in real terms for many of the people who the hon. Gentleman argues are affected by the proposals.

I note the hon. Gentleman's comments about entitlement and take-up. I made the point on Monday, and on several occasions since then, that I very much doubt whether any Government could live with a system of this kind growing at the rate of 1 million payments and £100 million per year. If, by some mischance, the hon. Member for Oldham, West had been the Minister responsible I am sure that he would have done something about it by now.

Mr. Meacher: Yes, we would have cut unemployment.

Mr. Newton: What has been revealed by what has happened? The serious point to which the House must direct its attention is whether the system is workable in the long run. As I have said twice this week, that is why we have brought forward proposals for a different system through the social fund in the Social Security Bill, but we have nearly two years to go before those proposals can be implemented and we face a dramatic problem affecting local officers now.

I was amazed when the hon. Member for Oldham, West implied that there would be much grumbling by staff at being asked to digest complex regulations at short notice. I have had quite a lot of contact with DHSS staff recently, and not just with people at headquarters who sometimes seem remote. If there is one thing that DHSS staff throughout the country want it is relief from the burden of single payments work which is making it almost impossible for them to do the rest of their work properly.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Disgraceful.

Mr. Newton: I have a letter from the hon. Gentleman complaining about the delays at his local DHSS office.

Mr. Clay: I have indeed written to the Minister and I spoke to staff at both my local DHSS offices last Friday. They want to get rid not of single payments but of the average eight-week backlog. People are waiting eight weeks for cookers and babywear. The DHSS offices want more staff and sufficient pay, even if it means working overtime to clear the backlog. They say that, if Ministers would pull their fingers out and do something, the backlog could be cleared in two weekends.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman knows that we are in the process of substantially increasing the number of staff in DHSS local offices because of a variety of problems. I suspect that almost anybody with a serious knowledge of the social security system accepts that nobody is likely to devise a means of coping sensibly, without some priority needs suffering, with the type of influx of claims that some local offices have experienced.

I mentioned on Monday a Sheffield office which received 4,000 claims for bedding over a relatively short period of time and 2,500 claims for furniture in four days. No serious administrative system can cope with that problem. I have here a schedule which I asked my officials to prepare. It lists the hon. Members who have asked about delay problems in their local offices during the past few weeks.I guess that at least half of them are sitting opposite me now.

Mr. Frank Field: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, because I have most certainly asked about delays. I have also asked how many of the extra 5,000 staff will come to Birkenhead, and the reply has been nil. Is the Minister aware that, in view of the way in which he is developing his argument, we must ask him a fundamental question—for whom is the welfare state being run? The Minister's answer is, the officers in local offices. That is one consideration, but we are also anxious about claimants. Is he aware that many of them have needs which must be met through the system? How will he guarantee that that happens?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman knows that I have a lot of respect for him. I am sure that he will want to listen to me when I say that the people who are most at risk of suffering as a result of what has happened in regard to some of the single payments campaigns and claims are claimants with genuine needs. Their cases should be considered as a matter of priority, but they all too easily get buried at the bottom of some unmanageable heap. Other sufferers are people who want a speedy and proper resolution of their normal weekly claim to benefit.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Is the Minister aware — I am sure that he is — that DHSS staff said before there was any welfare rights campaign such as the Minister has referred to that they have for some considerable time been labouring under an increasingly intolerable work load, involving even routine business? It is disgraceful for the Minister to blame welfare rights campaigns for the problems in his Department. The staff have been telling him about them for years.

Mr. Newton: I am not trying to do what the hon. Lady suggests. Acting faithfully within the current and agreed complementing system, which is being reviewed, and the results of which review we shall consider when we have them, Ministers have been trying to ensure that DHSS offices are properly staffed to do their work. I do not believe that it is possible in any reasonable administrative system to cope with sudden torrents of work such as this, which are being experienced by some DHSS offices. The sufferers are not our staff, difficult though they may find it, but the claimants for whom we are unable to do the job that we would like to do and whose proper claims we cannot process as we would like.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I think that I am right in saying that about 800 of the 5,000 new jobs will come to Scotland. What is the likelihood of a similar number being created in the following year to deal with the delays?

Mr. Newton: I gather that the exact figure that the hon. Gentleman seeks is 869. Regarding any further developments, I have said that we are awaiting the results of the complementing review, and obviously, we will want to look carefully and faithfully at those results when we have them.

Rather to my sadness, the hon. Gentleman was not present in the House on Monday when I had hoped to use one of my most interesting examples of what has been going on, in view of his well-known dedication to Strathclyde social work department. If he has read my statement or talked to some of his hon. Friends, he will know that I am concerned about the tick list which was filled in by a claimant who had been visited by a Strathclyde social worker — [Interruption.] I can understand that Labour Members do not wish to listen. They do not like this, do they? This list—[Interruption.] I am grateful to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, because I know he takes a serious interest in the work of the Strathclyde social work department.

The social worker visited the claimant and filled in the tick list form, asking for four single beds and mattresses, bedding for the whole family, two wardrobes, a three-piece suite, a cooker and cooker guard, three fires and fire guards, four hot water bottles, curtains, rods and something I cannot read, floor covering, repair of the washing machine and vacuum cleaner, cleaning equipment, kitchen utensils, crockery and cutlery, a carpet sweeper——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Newton: I am not going to stop. The list, continues with bath, hand, and tea towels, light fittings, draught-proofing material, a hot water tank jacket, a pushchair, a high chair, a safety gate, clothes and shoes for the whole family, fuel costs and rent arrears.

Dr. Godman rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Only one hon. Member may be on his feet at a time, and at present it is the Minister.

Dr. Godman rose——

Mr. Newton: I shall not give way until I come to the end of my little story. Having ticked all those items, the social worker got the claimant to sign the form and then sent it to the local——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I have already heard this three times.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman may have heard it three times, but it is well worth hearing a fourth time.

Having sent the form to the local DHSS office, the social worker provided the claimant with a copy of it, at which point the claimant decided to write to the local DHSS office in these terms:

"I am Writing this letter As my social worker came to visit me and told me I could claim for different Items he said he would send it to yous. I signed it and he posted it I dident pay much attention at first the next day he Gave me a copy I realised Most of the things I dont need so I am writing to let yous know the Items I do need. and could yous Ignore the letters he has sent I want to apply for these items I have listed below."

If that is what social workers and other welfare rights workers are doing in Strathclyde, it is deplorable.

Dr. Godman: The Minister mentioned me by name. May I first point out that the campaign was undertaken with the full support of the 19 district councils in the region, including — that rare animal — the few Conservative councils? The Minister quoted extensively from a letter, but in fairness he should also have quoted from the letter that was circulated with the check list. The letter states:

"Dear Sir/Madam

We are writing to you to draw your attention to certain proposed changes in Social Security legislation which will affect the rules for receiving grants for essential needs for those in receipt of or entitled to Supplementary Benefit or Housing Benefit Supplement. These changes are being introduced prior to the major changes proposed in the Social Security Bill."

If I catch Mr. Speaker's eye, I shall be able to enlarge on the campaign. I remind the Minister that the Strathclyde council, with other Scottish regional and islands councils, carried out joint campaigns with the DHSS to help my constituents, and other Scots who are severely handicapped, to acquire what is theirs by right.

Mr. Newton: As a number of hon. Members wish to speak, perhaps my best observation is that my confidence in what has happened in Strathclyde is not enhanced by the knowledge that all 19 district councils have joined in.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, consideration of Lords Amendments to the Wages Bill, the Agriculture Bill and the Dockyard Services Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

Supplementary Benefit

Question again proposed.

Mr. Newton: If that is a blatant example of some of the problems, let me give the House one or two other examples of what can happen.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): This is the Tories at their worst.

Mr. Newton: A lady who left her husband on Thursday night—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. However, I do not know how long it will last.

A woman left her husband on Thursday night. She took the children and moved to a women's hostel. On the following Tuesday, she returned to the marital home to resume a normal relationship, having received, in the meantime, over £300 supplementary benefit from another local office. On returning to her husband, only four days later, she requested a single payment for clothing for herself and the children, claiming that her husband gave it all away during her absence.

In another case, a claimant washed in excess of 60 items of clothing, bedding, towels, a dozen nappies, and other items, and put the wet washing into a bin bag to take it to the launderette. The bag vanished. The only explanation the claimant could give was that she had mistaken the bag for one of rubbish, had put the remnants of the family's tea in the bag and put it out for the dustman. [Laughter.]

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This is not funny; it is tragic. The Government do not understand.

Mr. Newton: There is the case where items were stolen from outside a launderette. The items were on top of the claimant's push chair. The mind boggles — [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. We cannot have these sedentary interventions.

Mr. Newton: The mind boggles at the push chair that could carry two sets of towels, two pairs of curtains, two double sheets, eight single sheets, four single blankets, two double blankets, two pillow cases, and a great raft of a family's clothing. It does not stand up. That is typical of many of the claims that we receive.

Mr. Frank Field: Why is the Minister citing such cases? Surely the current system deals with those claims. Most offices would not award claims for such lists. Claimants who dispute a decision can go to the appeal tribunals. Is the Minister saying that the appeal tribunals would allow such grants?

Mr. Newton: The system that gives rise to a large number of palpable and probable claims of that kind, in a volume which makes it increasingly difficult for DHSS staff to do a proper job of checking claims fairly, and paying claims promptly, is an inherently unsatisfactory system. We feel that it needs reining back and curbing in the way we have proposed.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose——

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding) rose——

Mr. Newton: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis).

Sir Kenneth Lewis: I am sympathetic to what my hon. Friend is trying to do. I have no doubt that there is abuse in the system. Equally, I have no doubt that that is aided and abetted by the Labour party. How on earth can DHSS officers give out grants for what are obviously spurious claims and simply say that they do not have the time to check them? My hon. Friend's suggestion will not end that difficulty. It may lessen the amount being spent. If DHSS officers continue to give out grants, even at the lower rate, there will still be abuse of the system. How will my hon. Friend deal with that? We must do so.

Mr. Newton: I recognise my hon. Friend's point. It is important that we do our job in two respects—first, to ensure that we get benefit effectively and promptly to those who should have it and need it and, secondly, to prevent abuse. The same is true of weekly benefit. We must try to ensure as far as possible that we do not make payments to people who should not have them or who make bogus claims.

The core of a sizeable part of the problem is that a system that is used to generate claims on this basis makes it almost impossible for us to do the sorting out job needed, to prevent abuse and to ensure that we get benefit to those who need it.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Newton: Let me reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding.

The first requirement of a system which works as my hon. Friend and I want it to work is that it should be on a manageable scale and be confined to meeting the needs which we all agree must be met.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Newton: In a time-limited debate, it would be wrong for me to take up too much more of the time of the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I hope that the Minister goes to confession on Sunday.

Mr. Newton: On Monday, I outlined the general lines along which the regulations seek to change the position, concentrating on those we see as having priority needs, including pensioners, the disabled and those needing long-stay hospitals. I outlined the way in which we have responded to the Social Security Advisory Committee's specific recommendations, although I recognised that it did not endorse the proposals as a whole. I continue to believe that what we have put before the House and what is being prayed against tonight is a reasonable, balanced package to restore sensible working to this system and to enable us to achieve those objectives which have rightly been urged upon us.

10.7 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): To a certain extent, we should be grateful that we are having this debate at all. If my reading of the situation is correct, the Government were trying to slip off to summer beaches without having a debate. These regulations are subject to the negative procedure. There is no requirement for a debate to be held before they are implemented. I acknowledge the fact that we are having this debate, but I suspect that it is only because some of us agitated hard to get it.

This whole matter is based on establishing the existing levels need. The evidence of the increases in single payments suggests that the Minister has seriously underestimated the level of need. He seeks to justify the increases in terms of abuse of the system. There may be abuse. If it exists, it should be eradicated. The point that comes across to me strongly from my constituency experience and elsewhere is that there has been a substantial increase in real need. But the Government are moving in exactly the wrong direction to deal with it. I put it squarely to the Minister that the ordinary and long-term rates that apply especially to unemployed people with families, are not high enough to enable people to replace major items, especially furniture. That is proven without any shadow of doubt. The Minister's case is based on the fact that the scale rates are adequate and that the families who receive the scale rates can survive without single payments unless there are exceptional circumstances. I deny that. The ordinary scale rates of £29·80 for a single person and £34·90 for a couple are patently not adequate to meet the replacement cost of major items that are currently provided by single payments. I understand what the Minister is saying, but the evidence that he is quoting suggests that his analysis is quite wrong and that he is moving in totally the wrong direction.

The question of check lists was openly recognised and endorsed by the Social Security Advisory Committee. It may be that the regulations are being abused. If the examples which were read out are true, the claims should not have been accepted. The adjudication officers can rule them out of court. That is the way to deal with that problem. The SSAC is not composed of wild and extreme leftist councillors or whatever. It accepts that, if used responsibly, check lists can assist claimants through these bewilderingly complex areas. [Interruption.] As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) reminds me, the Government have, in the past, introduced check list forms of their own.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was right to pick up the point made by the Minister under pressure that the system, as presently constituted, depends on the massive failure to take up the benefits to which people are entitled. If that is the case, it is a dire state of affairs.

The changes made in relation to furniture grants will cause exceptional hardship. The changes that the Government are making in regulation 28 when Giro cheques are not paid are regressive and are to be regretted. In my experience, many claimants are not aware of their entitlements.

I am also worried about the changes to regulation 30 where we have the health and safety discretionary fallback. That is a mean and hard change to make. At the end of the day, the adjudication officers in my part of the country use that provision with great care and only in exceptional circumstances, which the regulation was designed to cover. The Government's proposal to change that regulation is deeply regretted.

The single payments regulations have differing rates of incidence in different regions of the country. We have had debates about that in Standing Committee. I am worried about the disproportionate effects that the changes will have on some of the regions that have traditionally relied on single payments, for whatever reason. Scotland, Northern Ireland and some other places which have a higher proportion of claims per 1,000 live claims involving single payments will be particularly hard hit. Not only that, but there will be localised effects. The whole economy of places such as Easterhouse, where I was born and brought up, in the constituency of Provan in the east end of Glasgow will have substantial sums of money withdrawn at a stroke by these regulations. That will have severe micro-economic local effects. The total number of claims paid in areas such as Scotland is traditionally higher and the regional effects will be varied and hard to bear.

I am left with the conclusion that this is a Treasury order being visited on the Minister. I do not believe that his heart is in these changes, however much he may go on about abuses. It is just taking money out of the social security system in advance of bringing in the Social Security Bill so that when the time comes he can say that it has not been as bad as some Opposition Members had expected. I certainly oppose these regulations.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): When the welfare state system was introduced following Beveridge, it was considered to be a wonderful thing for the country and was the envy of the world. However, it has become a monster, because it has become universal and not selective, and it is not always targeted on the low-income families. The Conservative party wants the money to reach those who are in genuine need.

In one hand I hold a letter from the social services department at Sheffield, and in the other—I can see the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) flinching—I have a leaflet published by the social services department at Oldham, part of which I represent.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order, when so many hon. Members have been sitting in the Chamber for hours waiting to participate in the debate, for the Government Front Bench, through Parliamentary Private Secretaries, to feed a Back Bencher with a brief when he has been here for only five minutes and others have waited for the past hour?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for the Chair. Besides, the debate only started at 9.26 pm.

Mr. Dickens: How could it ever be alleged that I need feeding?

The leaflet from Oldham is paid for by ratepayers' money, to cream off taxpayers' money. If people are in need they should get help, but when they start to climb on to a gravy train, which uses a bottomless pit of money, there is no end to it. I shall explain the front cover of the leaflet. It says:

"Claim it while you can."

It is printed in three colours, and we all know from our election addresses what thousands of copies of three-colour runs on superior quality paper will have cost the ratepayers of Oldham.

The leaflet says:

"If you get: supplementary benefit, supplementary pensions, housing benefit,"— do not leave it at that. Get the nose in the trough. It offers: "cash help with laundry and baths, cash help with special diets"—

I do not need those—

"cash help with clothing and shoes, cash help with baby things."

I shall not go through the list, because other hon. Members wish to speak and I am a fair man.

There is a claim form for dozens and dozens of items, listed on both sides, asking whether one needs this, that or the other. A woman can go into the DHSS and say, "Last night I lost all the clothing off my washing line except for one pair of knickers." The DHSS officer will say, "We cannot have this. We must replace all the other items of clothing. Let her have"—I cannot go through the list because I would be embarrassed, but the woman can get many items of clothing, and if she has a hole in her pullover, she can have a new one.

I may have made my point in a good-humoured way, but this is a serious problem. We are the custodians of taxpayers' money. We have to use it in a sensible way. We are not in business to feed Socialism. Let me explain what I mean by that. It is no coincidence that most of the Opposition Members who are in the Chamber have constituencies in inner city areas. Many of their constituents enjoy rent and rate rebates and are provided with free glasses, free prescriptions and all kinds of other free benefits. They do not mind if the Labour party inspires this kind of literature. Why do they not mind? They do not mind because it is free. If they feel that they can get something free from the Government and from the ratepayers, they will continue to vote for those people. That was the downfall of Liverpool.

The Labour party has cottoned on to the fact that the people who vote for them want more and more money for things that they do not need and to which in many cases they are not entitled. That is what the Socialist party is up to, and that shame has to be exposed. I shall tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, why it has to be exposed. Industry, small shopkeepers and commerce pay the bulk of the rates and the bulk of the tax. Furthermore, the people who live in the outer suburbs, in constituencies such as mine, pay high taxes and high rates, and they see their hard-earned money being shovelled into a welfare state system that has become universal and not selective in helping those who are really in need.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is the hon. Gentleman able to say what proportion of the total social security budget constitutes single payments?

Mr. Dickens: It happens to be £400 million.

Does the House realise that what this Conservative Government are doing will not win local government elections or by-elections? However, they have had the guts to do something that is very much required in this country, because our welfare state system has run wild.

We want those who are really in need to be given help. That is why all our thinking is closely targeted on low-income families. We shall look after them. We are no longer prepared to tolerate a gravy train from which people demand things to which they are not entitled and which they do not even need. That is why we are taking these measures, and that has to be right. We must help those in need, but we must not be ripped off by those who do not need help.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Although we have heard such repulsive garbage from Conservative Members, we have not yet been given a single example of a claim that should not have been allowed. The Minister for Social Security had his colleagues rolling about in mirth when he referred to an individual who had lost a large amount of clothing. It was an interesting example for the Minister to quote. When the Foreign Secretary was Chancellor of the Exchequer he managed to lose a pair of trousers on a train, presumably when he was travelling first class. Therefore, it ill becomes Conservative Members to crack jokes about people losing clothes.

When the Minister referred to the Strathclyde check list, I thought that the most interesting and important part of that story was the letter that the claimant later wrote in which she said that she needed some of those items. Had the social worker not called, it is possible that those items which were needed and to which that person was entitled would not have been received. That is the most important moral to draw from that particular tale.

I should like to cite not the most overwhelming case for the need for single payments but an important and comprehensive one. If a family that has nothing and has been in some kind of residential social services home for a year or more — I have one such home in my constituency, in accommodation run partly by Dr. Barnardo's and partly by the social services—comes out of that accommodation with nothing, it no doubt horrifies Government Members to know that there is a general understanding with local DHSS offices that that family can get £800 by way of a single payment. Government Members will say that is shocking, but I should like one of them to explain how he would equip a house with furniture, carpets and curtains and with every other thing it needs for £800.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clay: No, I will not give way. We have heard quite enough garbage and filth from the Government side without the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) joining in as well.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Clay: I am not giving way: the hon. Lady is wasting time.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady can see that the hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Clay: That is one serious example and the Government have perpetrated a deceit in this matter because we hear how much the figures have gone up. Those figures represent claims that are paid. We hear lots of jokes about claims that perhaps should not have been made and about little bits of, perhaps, fraud here and there. The money paid out in claims was needed. The Government have not explained why the amounts have increased. We have just had a lot of hysteria about fraud. The only explanation that we have heard is that people are getting things they do not need. There has not been a word about the fact that perhaps, if a claimant has been unemployed for two or three months, it is unlikely that such a person will need new clothes in that time and the number of people having babies in a two or three-month period of unemployment may be low, but when people have been unemployed for two or three years and when over 100,000 people have been unemployed for over five years and with the percentage of the long-term unemployed going up, that is bound to give rise to claims and explains the rise in the need for single payments.

I defend the advice and welfare rights centres that have been so much abused. My local DHSS staff tell me that they are a godsend even though they have a backlog. They say that those advice centres do a lot of the work that the DHSS should be doing. They are not encouraging people to make claims willy-nilly; they are explaining to people what they are and are not entitled to and how to claim and how much money they are likely to receive. If all the people who use those centres had to go to the DHSS for long interviews, there would be ever more pressure on a system that is nearly breaking down as it is. The DHSS should fund those advice centres for the good and effective work they are doing on behalf of the DHSS.

A matter that has not been mentioned sufficiently in the debates is the danger that exists following the withdrawal of many of these single payments. I shall give an example from the borough of Lewisham, where I stay when I am in London. In 1985, Lewisham council tested seven second-hand cookers on sale in its area through second-hand dealers. Every one of them failed the safety regulations and the condition of one was deadly. The local DHSS and the gas and electricity boards subsequently reached an agreement that, because there were obviously no safe second-hand cookers on the market, single payments would be made for new items at the cheapest available price, £225. I dare say that all Government Members always make sure when they buy a cooker that they buy a new one, but they expect claimants to get second-hand ones that blow up and kill them or burn them.

It is an interesting admission to hear Government Members say it is shocking that claimants should have new cookers rather than buy second-hand ones that are unsafe. The likelihood, not that claimants are being forced to buy second-hand cookers, is that traders will cash in and ask ludicrous prices for them. But that is all the DHSS will supply because it will not pay for new cookers and the dangers will increase. There are many other examples, quite apart from cookers. The restriction in single payments will cause not only further poverty and hunger and lead to people freezing because they cannot afford the clothes they need; it will also cause real physical danger. There will be more fires and explosions and more poisoned water. The Government should be ashamed of themselves, not only for what they are doing but for the despicable way in which Government Members have uttered filth and garbage from the sewers of the 19th century rather than make out any sort of case.

10.29 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): As I put it to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), it is clear that a campaign has been orchestrated by the Labour party to flood the single payment system. It is nonsense for the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) to suggest that the notices have just been sent to people who recently came out of homes. They have been sent to every pensioner and person in receipt of housing benefit throughout my borough of Stockport, without exception. Now that the Labour party has been exposed, it is embarrassed. The single payment system causes a great deal of annoyance to the low-paid hard-working people who pay taxes. It causes them enormous resentment, and rightly so.

I recently came across two families living in terraced houses subject to a compulsory purchase order. One was occupied by a widow with two young children who was working and got no supplementary benefit. She was obliged to move and buy a second-hand cooker and second-hand carpets and curtains for her new home.

Next door was a family of four, none of whom was working, was doing any training or was making any effort to get a job and, my goodness, did they scoop the pool? They got a brand-new home, while the widow who had scrimped and saved for years in the most extraordinarily difficult circumstances had to go round the second-hand shops. She resented that, and there are many others in the same position.

Most people, when they need clothing, furniture, carpets or curtains, have to save. /Interruption./ Me too. The sooner the social fund comes in, the better. Then people who receive single payments will have loans and repay them. That is fair.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West, who has unfortunately left his seat, said that anyone who was unemployed could not afford to pay for something which at the moment is subject to a single payment. That is patent nonsense. Millions of people during the summer of this year saw people going to Mexico with, emblazoned across their chest, "We're here thanks to the DHSS". /Interruption./ They were bragging that they were there as a result of the welfare benefit system. /Interruption./ Good luck to them. If they can manage to save to go to the World Cup in Mexico, good luck to them. But if they can save to go to Mexico, they can save to buy a hot water bottle. The sooner the regulations are introduced the better.

10.32 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): We have before us tonight a Government who are presiding over record poverty. There are 7 million people in Britain living at or below the official poverty level. Earlier tonight the Government steam-rollered through the House a Bill which is designed to rob the poor of what little they have. These regulations are designed to take £100 million away from the poorest people in Britain and they are being steam-rollered through the House for the interim period between now and when the measures that we agreed earlier tonight come into effect.

As a result of the Social Security Bill, 19,000 households in my constituency will have their incomes cut. Of those, 2,700 households will have their incomes cut by more than £5 a week. The regulations will deprive already seriously disadvantaged and deprived people of essential help to enable them to survive. The Minister, who used to have a reputation as a liberal and a progressive, has treated us over so many months to a litany of measures designed to make the poor poorer and the rich richer that he lost his reputation long ago.

On the Jimmy Young programme this week, the Minister sought to justify these measures in very honeyed tones. We had the same story as he has given tonight about the check list. But he told his listeners that Members of Parliament were very lucky to have an opportunity to debate these regulations. He told them that there was no need to have a debate at all, because the new provisions would come into force on 11 August. He implied that it was only through his generosity that we would have an opportunity to debate the regulations—albeit for only an hour and a half.

This must be one of the most squalid, mean and nasty measures that this squalid, mean and nasty Government have taken since coming to office in 1979. The Minister gave the impression tonight that the regulations were being introduced because there had been an avalanche of single payments claims, and they were somehow preventing those in real need from receiving help. Listening to him, anyone would think that to obtain a single payment one had to be on supplementary benefit, and have less than £500 in the bank. We are dealing with people who have been unemployed for years in my constituency.

Things wear out and have to be replaced. Household items cost a lot of money. But the sort of household items that we are talking about do not cost as much as the items that Conservative Members consider to be essential. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) has many interests and incomes. Some Conservative Members have two or three jobs.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: He is a hypocrite.

Mr. Madden: The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) has a swimming pool. I am sure that she is not in any great need of a single payment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) is a hypocrite.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) must contain himself.

Mr. Madden: The Minister used to have a reputation as a progressive, but he should be deeply ashamed of this measure and of the way in which he is exploiting those who wish to claim their rights. They are entitled to those things. He has chosen to put the blame on welfare rights advisers who merely help the poor to obtain what is theirs by right. He does not care about the tax advisers or tax avoidance schemes that exist to help very rich people to obtain even more money. They do not need or deserve it, yet it is supplied at the taxpayers' expense.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major) rose—

Mr. Madden: I shall not give way.

Mr. Major rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister knows that the hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Madden: This disgraceful measure will rob the poor of help to which they legally have a right in order to obtain the things to which they are entitled. Those things make their meagre, mean lives a little better. We are dealing not with those who can stand on their own feet and look after themselves, but with those who need and deserve help. They need these things and are legally entitled to claim them.

We shall vote against the regulations. We shall be beaten, but the verdict on this Government will be given at the next general election. We will have the political commitment to ensure that the poor of this country are given the resources that they need to climb out of poverty. We will reduce poverty and reform the social security system. At present social security workers are deeply ashamed of the inadequate service that they can give to the poor of this country. We shall give those workers the resources and the political support and commitment to tackle the poverty that the Government have created, which will be made worse as a result of these regulations.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I shall be brief, because I am conscious of the time. I shall try to deliver my speech at a slightly lower level of synthetic indignation than did my predecessor, the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden).

[Mr. Michael Stern]

It seems that two issues have not been emphasised adequately. The Opposition have rightly argued that there is a comparison — [Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) will shut up for a change. There is a comparison between tax reliefs, which are available, and payments under the regulations. The Opposition have made the comparison time and time again in many different ways. In both instances, payments are made as a matter of right. The Opposition have not said that where the right of tax relief has been abused or has become too expensive, no Government have ever refrained from stopping or limiting it. Why, therefore—

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stern: No, I shall not give way. I have only one minute in which to complete my remarks.

Why do the Opposition object when exactly the same position is taken on a system which is so clearly being abused to the extent that, in the words of the famous leaflet, it can be treated only as a closing down sale?

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockport, North): Prove the abuse.

Mr. Stern: The Opposition use their social and welfare rights arguments when talking about claimants. They do not talk to the people next door to the claimants who are extremely resentful that they are working for a living and living at a lower level than those who are living off the state. Until they understand that, they will never understand why a Conservative Government are governing the country.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): This has been an extraordinary debate. The Minister has sought to argue that the regulations are necessary because the numbers and costs of the payments being made have increased so much. He implied this evening, as he did on Monday, that this is due almost entirely to fraud. In an effort to justify what is a contemptuous allegation, he endorsed the suggestion that payments should be made for unforeseen needs only. That has been the tenor of the remarks of Conservative Members. That is not the law, and it will not be the law even when the regulations are passed tonight.

The Minister justified his insinuations by saying that weekly benefit levels have risen under the Government and that need cannot, therefore, have increased. He must be aware, though I fear that many of his hon. Friends are not, that the long-term unemployed remain on the short-term rate of benefit until they are 60, drawing over £12 a week below the income that is considered adequate for any other group drawing benefit for longer than a year. How can the Minister say that in those circumstances need cannot have increased? We know that the number of long-term unemployed increases and the length of their unemployment increases with every year that the Government remain in office.

The smugness of the speeches of Conservative Members has been intolerable. The hon. Member for Stockport, North (Mr. Favell), who does not even have the courtesy to listen to the speeches of Opposition Members, suggested that claimants should save from their weekly benefit. Does he think that he could save to buy or to replace, in the terms of the regulations, carpets, tables, chairs and wardrobes from £29·80 a week, which is what a single person has to live on, apart from his housing cover? Could he raise the money if he were trying to keep himself and his wife on £48·40 which is what an unemployed couple receive? It is contemptible talk—

Mr. Favell: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. It is contemptible to talk about people saving from sums of the sort that I have mentioned. Even before the unemployed reach the stage of claiming supplementary benefit, the Government have removed the payment to which they used to be entitled. The abolition of the earnings-related supplement means that a single man is nearly £20 a week worse off than he was when the Government came to power. It is grossly misleading to imply, as the Minister did in his statement on Monday and in his speech this evening, that the unemployed are better off than they were.

It seems that the Government object strongly to take-up campaigns. On Monday the Minister took credit for the improved advice services that his Department is offering, but apparently an improved advice service is acceptable only as long as nobody takes the advice. He argued at length tonight about the intolerable burden that welfare rights campaigns have imposed on staff in the context of the regulations. Most of his hon. Friends seem to swallow that argument because they are too ill-informed to realise that the announcement that the Government proposed to reduce and remove the grants in the social fund and pave the way for that by the regulations created those campaigns. The regulations are not following the campaigns; they initiated them. They are the cause of the very thing about which the Minister has been complaining.

On Monday the Minister assured one of his hon. Friends, who was worried about insulation grants, that they will not be affected by the regulations that we are discussing tonight. That is good, and of course we are pleased about that, but what it means is that those who can get a grant at all will be able to have a well insulated room with a bed, a cooker and a heater, but no curtains, no carpet, no cupboards, no chairs, no tables, no cooking utensils, no plates, no towels, and so on — [Interruption.] Conservative Members do not even know what is in the regulations. Those people cannot have those things, except what they can buy from £75 for a single person, or the princely sum of £125 for a couple. Not long ago we all saw a little story in the paper about the Prime Minister taking a special outing to somewhere in Chelsea to buy lamps for her new home. I wonder how much change she got out of £75.

I am well aware that some Conservative Members will argue that £75 or even £125 is a great deal of money, but if they compare it with the Government's own list of published costings—not exactly generous in themselves —they will see that the Government expect one to be able to get a vacuum cleaner for about £35 or a washing machine for £100. If they compare that with the £75 or £125 for a couple, which is supposed to provide for all their other needs, they may begin to understand how inadequate the measures are.

This is a contemptible measure. Conservative Members have sought to justify it by a series of contemptible speeches. They have reminded us vividly in the debate that the Conservative party stands for wealth, privilege and greed, and does not care who it stands on.

10.47 pm

Mr. Newton: Perhaps my role at this stage might sensibly be to cool down some of the things that have been said in the debate, which has led to a good deal of extraordinary language, including some of the things said by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and others, from which it has to be understood that his conclusion is that to be liberal and progressive — to attach the adjectives that he attached to me in some former incarnation — one has to be willing to preside over a degree of manifest abuse of the social security system, which is militating against the interests not just of the taxpayer, but of serious, sensible claimants throughout the country. That is the point——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Newton: I shall tell the House frankly that I have never seen anything liberal or progressive, or indeed sensible or capable of any other reasonable label, about allowing abuse in a system — [HON. MEMBERS: "Prove it."] — that already does too little to ensure fairness between those who are on benefit and those who are in low-paid work but not on benefit.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) asked what we were doing about our worries about the unfairness of the present system towards some of the people who are not on benefit. He knows what we are doing. We propose to introduce a family credit which will double the amount going to such families, and that will significantly improve the position.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must address the House. He should not turn his back on the Chair.

Mr. Newton: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to turn my back on you. I wish to turn my face to the Opposition Front Bench and ask a question which the Opposition never answer. In all this rhetoric, are the Opposition saying that they will restore any reductions and restrictions in single payments? Will that produce another bill from the shadow Chancellor?

Mr. Meacher: I shall give the Minister an answer if he wants one. The causes of the huge rise in single payments are the continuing enormous rise in unemployment, the rapid growth in long-term claimants whose needs are greatest and the inadequate rate of weekly benefit. Our answer is not to tackle the symptoms but to tackle the cause by reducing unemployment by 1 million in two years. That is the real answer. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that we are debating a prayer, and prayer time for me was always a quiet time.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member for Oldham, West has given his answer at considerable length and that answer was no. He is not going to restore the consequences of the restrictions that we are proposing. At the end of the day, the reason why the hon. Gentleman will not restore the cuts is that he knows that, if he were a Minister, he would have to act on these problems to protect the sensible working of the social security system.

Mrs. Beckett: I should like to remind the Minister that only a few days ago my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) reminded him that one of our three priorities is to give the unemployed the long-term rate of benefit. They would get an immediate increase of £12 a week from a Labour Government. Is the Minister going to match that?

Mr. Newton: That is very interesting. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] The last time I did to the hon. Member for Oldham, West what I have just done, was during the debate a week or so ago when the hon. Gentleman was banging on about the £3·6 billion that he was going to spend and I said that as far as I could see it would be £3·6 billion, instead of £5·6 billion, only if he took all the money back from those on supplementary benefit and housing benefit, leaving those people no better off than they were before. I did not get an answer to that point either. Perhaps we should have some answers from the Opposition, because we no longer know whether the Opposition will have £5 billion, £10 billion or £20 billion.

It is absolutely clear that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) does not have the foggiest notion what the figure is and he is frightened silly by the hon. Member for Oldham, West coming to the House night after night making further promises to spend money.

The non-answer from the hon. Member for Oldham, West tonight reveals clearly that the proposal is sensible, reasonable and necessary, and I rest my case.

Mr. Tony Banks: Although the Minister has given way, he has not at any time during the course of his various rants and rambles said whether there is firm evidence of abuse of single payments. He made many claims, but he did not say that there had been any abuse. I have sat through the debate and did not hear the Minister say that.

Many people have been forced into poverty by Government policies, and because they have turned up and claimed their rights and because so many people are now in poverty, the Government have said that they will change the system and take their rights away from them.

It is strange that the Minister, who has given the House a series of anecdotes, has never been able to show that there has been abuse. All that he has said is that there has been a great deal of pressure on the system. Of course there has; it has been brought about by the economic and social policies of this Government, who have created so much poverty——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): And the cuts in staff.

Mr. Banks: And the cuts in staff, as my hon. Friend says. So the Minister is changing——

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Banks: So the Minister is changing the system——

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady can see that the hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Banks: It is obscene that here we have a bunch of well-fed, contented Tory Members, many of whom turned up late for this debate, screaming abuse at welfare rights organisations which have simply pointed out to individuals that to which they are entitled. We have heard no complaints about income tax payers claiming the rights that the Government extend to them. They can afford to employ expensive tax accountants and lawyers to tell them what they can claim. I have not heard the Government say that, because people are claiming those tax benefits, they must be changed. I have not heard the Government say that, because so many people get mortgage interest relief, they will abolish it, too.

We are talking about people thrust into poverty by the Government's policies claiming what is theirs by right, and the Government——

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to order [22 July].

The House divided: Ayes 179, Noes 233.

11.8 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I missed the last Division, which is why I am out of breath, and would like to ask your advice on how I should make representations regarding the procedure of the House. I made representations first to the Deputy Serjeant at Arms that a bus and about seven taxis were blocking the entrance to the House. He told me that today was wedding day and I got the impression that we took second place to those participating in it. We all support the wedding — [Interruption.] Some hon. Members may not support it. This is a charade. Tonight we have had a running Whip, some of us have been entertaining our wives and families — [Interruption.] I shall not tell you about the other little problem I had last week when I found —

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I am sorry he missed the Division. I remind him that the Serjeant at Arms said that there might be difficulties today and that hon. Members should be aware of that. I shall have the matter looked into.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seems that the Sessional Orders have been moved and accepted by the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) has run into trouble. Therefore, the Sessional Orders have not been complied with.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am aware of the Sessional Orders. I shall have the matter looked into to see why the hon. Member was not here.

Mr. Randall: Further to my original point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I recall that at the beginning of this Session, the House voted on a matter concerning the Metropolitan police. Perhaps I should quote the question that the House voted on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member need not refresh my memory. I am well aware of the matter. I am aware of what has happened tonight. I assure the hon. Member that I shall have the matter looked into. It has been an exceptional day. We should move on to the business of the House.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): On a different point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It appertains to the Wages Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall make an announcement about the Wages Bill which may deal with the point of order. If not, the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) can raise it when we consider the Bill.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). Would it not be common courtesy to hon. Members if the entrance to the House and the yard around it were kept clear at times when it can be anticipated that there will be a vote? It does not seem unreasonable to anticipate votes. All hon. Members know the time of tonight's votes. Priority should be given to allowing hon. Members access to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no question about that. We are all aware of the Sessional Orders and the precedents. I shall have the reason why the hon. Member was delayed in getting to the House tonight looked into.

Mr. Bermingham: Is the Chair prepared to concede, bearing in mind the debate, that steps will be taken to ensure that it does not happen again and that the result of the inquiry will be reported to the House before the House rises?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will take steps to see that the Sessional Orders are carried out.

Wages Bill

Lords amendments considered.

11.13 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The House will wish to know that Mr. Speaker has selected two manuscript amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and other hon. Members. Copies are available in the House and from the Vote Office. The amendments will be discussed in the appropriate groups, which are those headed by the Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 34.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am pleased that Mr. Speaker has accepted two manuscript amendments. However, the Government have acted with unholy haste to try to get this shabby legislation on the statute book.

In Committee hon. Members did not have a copy of Hansard, because of the number of Bills going through the House. At that time, about 10 Bills were being considered by Standing Committees. Hon. Members were unable to avail themselves of the Hansard record of Committee sittings. The Government amended clause 26 concerning the redundancy payments scheme. Originally, the scheme was to be operative from 1 October. The Government decided that, by amending clause 26, they could save an extra £50 million. That proposal has caused complications in my constituency, where there have been massive redundancies in the shipbuilding industry. As a result of the date being brought forward, more shipyard workers were made redundant. The shipbuilding employers were not able to claim the 35 per cent. from the central fund. Therefore, more workers than necessary were made redundant to make up the shortfall.

I submit that there is no reason why the Bill should be discussed tonight. Hon. Members should have sufficient time to table amendments and consider those made by the other place. Wages councils are not discussing employees' claims pending the passage of this legislation and they hope that the Bill will be passed before the recess.

Clause 26 is sufficient reason for the House not to discuss the Bill. The redundancy payments scheme, to which employers and employees contribute, made a profit last year of £9 million.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is straying far from his point of order. He is arguing his case.

Mr. Dixon: I am explaining why I am raising the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I submit that the House should not proceed with the debate on the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The only consideration for me is the decision of the House. The House has already decided that the Bill will be considered. A motion to that effect has already been passed.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the 10 o'clock business motion was carried without a Division. It stated that the Bill would be considered tonight until any hour. I cannot go against that decision.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am bound by the decision of the House.

Mr. McWilliam: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The business motion merely says that the Bill "may" be considered after 10 o'clock. It does not say that it "must" be considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The arguments yesterday by the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) were made to Mr. Speaker by other hon. Members. That is why Mr. Speaker considered the manuscript amendments. The timing of the debate is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Nellist: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thank you for your ruling on the two manuscript amendments, which we submitted this afternoon in the expectation of the debate being taken later this evening.

The point of order that I raised yesterday in the presence of Mr. Speaker was considered by him on the basis that the 1984-85 report of the Committee on Procedure clearly laid down standard guidelines as to how much time should pass between consideration of different stages of a Bill. The Leader of the House was present during that exchange. At my request, the right hon. Gentleman came to the Dispatch Box. He produced an example of the last time a Bill had left the other place and arrived in the Commons the following day. In 1977, almost 10 years ago, that not unprecedented but certainly unusual mechanism was used.

I do not want to develop the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), but I wish to request a further ruling. It is clear that the Bill is being rushed through because of the change of the date in part III, which was announced on virtually the last sitting of Standing Committee K. As far as I can discover from a brief reading of "Erskine May", we may consider on the same day or subsequent day to the Third Reading in the House of Lords the final stages of a Bill in this place if there is an "emergency". How is an "emergency" defined? Is it an "emergency" if the Government want to "save" an extra £50 million from the redundancy payments scheme? That is not their money. That is a scheme into which employers and employees have paid and from which they expect to gain money when faced with the problem of job losses.

I have raised this point of order now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because, when I raised it yesterday and Mr. Speaker kindly and carefully gave his ruling, neither he nor I was aware that at about 8 o'clock last night the Government would bring in a host of new amendments on Third Reading in the other place. Those amendments were not available to any hon. Member until later this morning. It took my hon. Friends and I some hours poring over last night's amendments——

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): The hon. Gentleman was moonlighting.

Mr. Nellist: If the hon. Gentleman wants to comment, he can do so under his own steam. He should give me a little quiet while I am finishing my comments.

We were not able to consider those amendments until this morning because they were not tabled by the Government until 8 o'clock yesterday—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) must contain himself.

Mr. Nellist: My legitimate point of order, not like the bogus heckling coming from the Tory Benches, is to ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how, in the light of the rules that govern the House, in "Erskine May" or wherever, the Chair defines an "emergency" when it allows the Government to bring a Bill from the House of Lords into the Commons within 24 hours. I can think of several occasions in the past three years, never mind the past 10, which marked a far greater crisis for the Government to get through than merely the saving of £50 million, by creative accountancy, which has been put into a redundancy insurance fund by workers and employers in this country. I ask you to rule on that. Is this a necessary emergency to enable them to get away with this tonight?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not the job of the Chair to give definitions about "Erskine May", I am glad to say. The Chair's job is to carry out the rules of the Houe and to proceed with what is in order. I understand that hon. Members may well criticise the timing and actions of the Government and so on. However, everything that is taking place is completely in order and it will be in order when we consider the Wages Bill.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. An important point has been raised by my hon. Friend the member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon). He said that Government Departments are already interpreting law which has not even been made yet because the Bill has not been approved by the House. If that is the case, it is a serious legal principle that should be clarified. If people are being denied their rights under the present legislation because this legislation has not been introduced, it is a serious matter that should be clarified by the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My job is to decide whether it is proper and in order to discuss the Lords amendments to the Wages Bill tonight, and it is.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Popular): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You were good enough, in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), to say what you considered to be the duties of the Chair. With respect, I have always understood that one of the duties of the Chair is to protect the rights of private Members so that they can properly carry out their duties to the House and to their constituents. The procedure which is now being adopted does not provide facilities for hon. Members to carry out their duties properly.

We are dealing with a Bill of considerable complexity. It is a Bill which, as those who served on the Standing Committee will recall, involved a great deal of research to understand all its implications. It involved not only a great deal of research, but a great deal of consultation with interested parties, such as the Low Pay Unit and others. Since it is impossible for any such study of the complexity to be made and for any consultation with outside bodies to take place between 10.30 am and 11 pm on a single day, I submit that the procedure we are now having to undergo does not provide proper facilities for hon. Members to carry out their duties to the House and to their constituents. Therefore, I believe that it is right for my hon. Friends to seek your help, against the Government, to ensure that the job can be done properly and in accordance with the normal procedures of the House. That can be done only if the Minister will take the Bill away and bring it back at another time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has had great experience in the House. I have made arguments such as that myself, and it may be valid. However, my duty is to interpret the rights of Back Benchers in accordance with the rules and procedures of the House. All I can say is that, although we may think that the debate comes too soon after the Bill has left the other place, everything is in order. It is in order to proceed with the debate on the Lords amendments, and I am bound to allow the debate to take place.

Clause 1

GENERAL RESTRICTIONS ON DEDUCTIONS MADE, OR PAYMENTS RECEIVED, BY EMPLOYERS

Lords amendment: No. 1 in page 2, line 33, after first "of" insert—

"(i)"

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 33, after "wages" insert

", or

(ii) any overpayment in respect of expenses incurred by the worker in carrying out his employment,"

Mr. Trippier: Clause 1(5)(3) contains a provision which excludes deductions made by employers to recover earlier overpayments of wages from the requirements of part I. It is common practice in many organisations to make small overpayments of wages or expenses, for administrative convenience, which are then recovered from a later payment of wages. An example would be where final figures on bonus due or expenses claims are not available in the pay office when the computer is run, so a standard sum is paid and the balance paid or recovered later. In the Government's view, deductions for such reasons should not be caught by the Bill. Otherwise provision to make such deductions would have to be made explicitly in the contract of employment, with the result that vast numbers of contracts would have to be rewritten. An employer would also have to ensure that all workers liable to suffer such deductions had been given, at some point in advance of the first such deduction being made, a copy or explanation of the term of the contract providing for the deduction. In short, if such deductions were covered, it would lead to the need for substantial changes in administrative and personnel practice in many companies. In our view, that should not be necessary.

The Lords amendments with which we are here concerned are intended to close a gap in clause 1(5)(a). In some circumstances, employers will seek to recover an overpayment of expenses which has been made to a worker in the course of his employment. Because expenses are not included in the definition of wages for the purposes of the Bill, they are not caught by the existing wording of clause 1(5)(a).

Let me emphasise, however, that these amendments will not affect the common law rights of workers where an employer recovers sums from wages on the ground that he had made an earlier overpayment of expenses and the worker thinks the recovery involves a breach of contract. The Bill will not prevent workers from continuing to take employers to the ordinary courts about alleged breaches of contract arising from the non-payment of expenses. Furthermore, there is no possibility that these amendments could give rise to injustice. If the worker believes the employer is deducting more than what was overpaid he can complain to a tribunal, which will determine the matter. If what is being deducted is no more than the earlier overpayment, the worker has not lost anything.

We believe that expenses should be treated in the same way as wages concerning deductions to recover earlier overpayments. I commend these amendments to the House.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): There is no need to spend long on these amendments. The Opposition accept that they should be made. However, given the nature of the Bill, its mean-mindedness, the way in which it will cut the wages of some of our poorest workers, and the unreasonableness with which the Government have brought the Bill to the House when the other place finished with it only yesterday, we are inclined to be bloody-minded and to oppose amendments such as these, so that employers would have to specify in contracts the right to take back over-payment of expenses. However, we have decided to proceed on the basis of common sense, and it is obviously the case that sometimes mistakes are made and workers are overpaid wages or expenses, and it is better that these things should be settled amicably. We are not opposed to the amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 2

DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES OF WORKERS IN RETAIL EMPLOYMENT ON ACCOUNT OF CASH SHORTAGES ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 4, line 3, leave out "respect of" and insert "connection with"

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 4, in page 4, line 7, leave out from "involving" to "of" in line 8 and insert

"(whether on a regular basis or not)—

(a) the carrying out by the worker"

No. 5, in page 4, line 11, at end insert

", or

(b) the collection by the worker of amounts payable in connection with retail transactions carried out by other persons directly with members of the public or with fellow workers or other individuals in their personal capacities;"

A manuscript amendment to the proposed Lords amendment No. 5, at end add

"or

(c) the collection by the worker of amounts payable in connection with any aspect of the worker's employment."

No. 6, in page 4, line 34, after "is" insert "or may be"

11.30 pm

Mr. Trippier: The first three amendments were tabled to make it clear beyond doubt that a certain category of worker that I will describe is covered by the protection of clauses 2 and 3. They involve no change of policy. On further consideration of the provisions, we have come to the view that the definition of retail employment does not make it absolutely clear that workers involved in the collection or receipt of money in connection with retail transactions but not in the retail transaction itself—that is, they are not involved in the sale or supply of goods or the supply of services, although they collect money in respect of such transactions by other people—are covered by the provisions of clauses 2 and 3, if a cash shortage occurs. This category would include cashiers who simply collect money and take no part in any service or sales activity.

I am sure all hon. Members would agree that it is desirable that these workers should be protected by the provisions of clauses 2 and 3 if they face a deduction from wages or are asked to make payments on account of a shortage in the cash they have collected in connection with retail transactions conducted by other people. The amendments are designed to make certain that these workers are so protected and I ask the House to accept them.

Turning to the fourth amendment, subsections (4) and (5) of clause 2 dealt with the situation where all or a part of the wages of a worker depend on the absence or extent of any cash shortage or stock deficiency. The aim of the subsections is to ensure that, if an employer pays a bonus related to the absence or size of a cash shortage or stock deficiency, any failure to pay the bonus is to be treated as a deduction from wages related to cash shortages or stock deficiencies and is covered by the protection of clause 2. This in effect means that the unpaid bonus must not exceed 10 per cent. of gross wages—that is, basic wages plus bonus.

These provisions are designed to protect the worker in instances where employers might attempt to avoid the requirements of part I by the introduction of special bonus arrangements. However, after further consideration we believe that subsection (4)(a) as drafted might have left a small gap in the intended protection. It is the intention that the protection should cover agreements which provide for a bonus, conditional on the absence of a cash shortage or stock deficiency, where the amount of bonus is clearly spelt out according to an arithmetical formula — so much shortage, so much bonus forgone. But it is also intended to cover agreements where payment of a bonus is discretionary or conditional on a number of different factors, one of which is the absence of cash shortages or stock deficiencies. It is uncertain whether the original wording covers the second category of agreements. The amendment agreed in the Lords is designed to make the position absolutely clear and to ensure that the protection of clause 2 applies to both types of bonus agreement.

I know that hon. Members will agree that an amendment designed to ensure that the protections in the Bill cannot be avoided is to be welcomed, and I commend it to the House. All four of these amendments are designed to ensure that workers are properly protected by part I of the Bill, and I hope the House will accept them.

I must ask the House to resist the Opposition's manuscript amendment. Again I shall explain the objective of the special controls in clauses 2 and 3 of the Bill. The clauses establish controls over deductions or payments on account of cash shortages or stock deficiencies from the wages of workers in retail employment. These are limited to 10 per cent. of any payment of wages to ensure that such workers are not left with little wage, due to deductions to cover shortages in the till, or stock losses. Retail employment is defined as employment involving the carrying out of a retail transaction, which is defined in clause 2.

The amendment made in the Lords extends the definition of retail employment to include those collecting money in respect of retail transactions carried out by others. However, the Opposition amendment further extends the definition of retail employment to cover work involving the collection by the worker of amounts payable in connection with any aspect of his employment. This takes the definition of retail employment right outside the area of retailing as the ordinary man or woman understands it, to cover all activities involving the collection of money in the course of employment. Conceivably, even the collection of money for an office party would be defined as retail employment.

Ms. Clare Short: That is not part of the job.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) says it is not part of the job, but it is tied in with the employment of the people employed in the firm.

For that reason, the amendment runs against the basic principles of clauses 2 and 3 as argued throughout the passage of the Bill. Those principles are, first, that the 10 per cent. limit is a special protection to meet a particular need and is specific to those involved in the area of retail employment as that term is normally understood. Secondly, it is in the specific area of retail employment involving transactions with the public that there has been public concern about excessive deductions because of cash shortages or stock deficiencies. Thirdly, it has never been an objective of the Bill to limit contractual deductions from wages in respect of the disappearance of the employer's property or cash where the worker is not involved in retail transactions with the public or where he works in an industry that does not have such transactions. I ask the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Mikardo: Throughout the proceedings in the Standing Committee, the Minister had great difficulty in finding illustrations of cases to support his arguments. When he did find examples, in nearly every case under pressure they proved false and he had to abandon them. He has given as an example that cash collected by somebody for an office party falls within the definition of the manuscript amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). [Interruption.] As she has just said in a barely audible aside, that is rubbish.

The Minister said that a collection for an office party was connected with the job, but I do not know, and I ask him whether he knows, of anybody with a contract of employment in which the job description specifies that it is a part of his job, if he is engaged in retailing or in any form of employment in which he handles his employer's cash, to collect cash for office parties. That is fantastic, imaginary, fairy-tale nonsense. If that is the only ground the Minister can put forward—and it was the only one that he did put forward—for resisting this amendment, it is a pretty poor performance.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): The performance of the Minister makes it clear that it is not only the Opposition parties who are suffering from the undue haste of the Government but also the Minister himself, because he has manifestly lacked time for preparation. He was wide of the mark when he said rather pompously that the manuscript amendment further extended the definition of retail employment quite outside retailing. That is not so, because the clause deals only with matters in connection with retail employment.

I support the manuscript amendment, although not with all the arguments on which I pride myself I might have thought up if the Government had given me time to prepare. This unseemly haste has crippled them as well as the Opposition parties. One of the worst features of part I of the Bill is that it sweeps away from those outside the narrow definition of retail employment the requirement of fairness and reasonableness that was in the Truck Acts.

In many ways the Government are going back 100 years—we all know that from their general economic policy—but it is going a bit too far to go back nearly a century by reversing what the old Truck Acts, God bless them in their antiquity, provided. Under the Truck Acts, a deduction from any worker's wages, whether he was in retail or not, had to be fair and reasonable. I need only direct hon. Members' attention to the magnificent speech of Lord Denning in another place on this matter to show how perverse the Government have been.

I agree that the manuscript amendment is not an ideal way of helping to remedy the defect—it is not—but the Government have left us no choice. In another place, and with no argument on their side, they rejected the idea of a non-statutory code of practice to be circulated to all employers. I thought that that was the very minimum that a civilised Government would allow. Yet, in spite of eloquent speeches in favour of a code of practice, they refused to have it.

Therefore, we are reduced to this second-best device in the manuscript amendment, which would have the valuable effect of extending to at any rate a few more workers protection against limitless arbitrary deductions. It would still leave a regrettably large number of workers subject to arbitrary deductions without even the basic requirement that they must be fair and reasonable. That is a bad position. It has been aggravated by the haste in which all this has been brought forward this evening, but it is better to support the amendment than to leave the matter to fester. I recommend my hon. Friends to do so.

Mr. Eastham: In Committee and again tonight the Minister appears to have been riddled with guilt. In his heart he recognises that this is a rotten Bill. He has trotted out again tonight, as he did on numerous occasions in Committee, statements about the right to go to tribunals. However, he will recall that when we challenged him on that point he said that he hoped that people would not go to tribunals too often because they might clog up the works. That was a confession that he really did not believe in using the tribunal procedure. But tonight he came to the Dispatch Box and said that there is nothing to prevent people from exercising their right to go to tribunals and he then trotted out the usual line that this measure is designed to protect the workers. He has said that several times.

The Bill is riddled with examples of workers' protections being taken away. If the Bill is enacted there will be no protection for anyone below the age of 21. Yet the Minister will try to make it sound good. It is mealy-mouthed to say that this measure is included to protect and improve the legislation. We know that the Bill is riddled with examples of where workers are not protected.

The Minister has been programmed, Civil servants present him with documents and he stands at the Dispatch Box and reads them out. I do not believe that he has any conviction about why he is requesting the House to approve the Bill.

Tonight the Minister gave us a classic example of that when he talked about office parties. Anybody would think that people in their places of work go to parties about 50 times a year. Usually, they are lucky to go to office parties once a year to celebrate Christmas. We are not talking about parties once a week, for 50 weeks every year. Yet that is the inept and weak argument that the Minister puts forward to justify his case. The manuscript amendment offers reasonable protection, and I hope that the House will support it.

Ms. Clare Short: The purpose of the manuscript amendment is to extend the 10 per cent. protection. At present that protection is given by the Government only to those workers in the retail sector who suffer cash shortages or stock dificiencies. Only then is there a limit on the deductions that workers can be subjected to for disciplinary reasons. Like the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), who spoke for the Liberal party, we believe that the provisions in this Bill and the sweeping away of the Truck Acts will lead to a massive increase in the use of deductions for disciplinary purposes. Workers can in future expect large sums to be taken out of their pay packets because their employers have decided that they have behaved improperly.

In Committee, the Minister gave examples of the sort of things that might lead employers to impose deductions. He spoke about lateness, absenteeism and perhaps a failure to comply with the health and safety regulations. Someone who had missed time at work through ill health might have money taken from his pay packet as well, because the employer might believe it to be absenteeism. The belief that failure to comply with health and safety regulations should lead to deductions is quite frightening, because we all know that good health and safety practices depend on a good spirit of co-operation and will not be helped by punitive sanctions.

We argued at length in Committee that the old provisions of the Truck Acts, which required that any deductions should be fair and reasonable, should be reinserted in the Bill. But that was rejected by the Government. We then argued that at the very least the 10 per cent. limitation should be applied to all workers in all circumstances — that it should not be possible for employers to deduct more than 10 per cent. from anyone's wages in any one week—but the Government rejected that, too.

Through the manuscript amendment, we seek to apply the 10 per cent. protection to all workers who are required to handle money as part of their job. What could be more reasonable than that? The Minister is wrong to say that that would apply to collections for office parties. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) clearly stated, no one has a job description that includes the organisation of office parties. The manuscript amendment makes it clear that this protection would apply also to workers who were required to handle money in the course of their work.

Under the Bill, if workers are required to handle money, they may well be subjected to deductions. They should be protected by the 10 per cent. provision. If the Government had any grace, they would accept the amendment. But no, the Minister dismisses it without putting up any reasonable argument. We welcome amendments Nos. 3, 4 and 5. Throughout the passage of the Bill we have fought for, and won, marginal improvements in the protection of workers even though we reject the Bill and find it deeply offensive.

The other amendments slightly extend the protection of the 10 per cent. limit to those who handle cash in connection with retailing but who might not be defined as being engaged in retailing. I think that the Minister gave the example of someone who had collected the cash after goods had been bought from someone else who may not have been protected by the Bill as drafted. That person would now be protected. That is a small improvement that will affect a relatively small group of workers, but we welcome it.

We also welcome amendment No. 6, which ensures that the 10 per cent. protection applies to workers on a bonus scheme that makes their wages dependent on perhaps an absence of cash shortages or stock deficiencies. The wage that the 10 per cent. is calcultated on would include, not exclude, the bonus, which would make a loophole in the Bill that would allow employers to make even larger deductions. Not being confrontationist and unreasonable like the Minister, we welcome his amendments. It is a pity that he is not willing to accept the substantive amendment.

Mr. Trippier: I was grateful to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) when he said that I was trying to make the measure sound good. I was trying to make my argument sound good, and I think that the news was good in my initial address to the House. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has admitted that the Opposition welcome the fact that the Government have moved on several issues. I found it confusing when the hon. Member for Blackley said that I lacked conviction. He cannot have it both ways. He cannot be heard to say that I was trying to make my remarks sound good and follow that by saying that I lack coviction.

Ms. Clare Short: My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) was trying to be nice to the Minister.

Mr. Trippier: That is characteristic of the hon. Gentleman. It was uncharacteristic of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), however, to be unfair to me. The hon. Gentleman is quite an expert on giving certain examples—for instance, "What does the Minister think would happen if this, that and the other were to apply in a small business?" I tried to give some examples of my own. If the hon. Gentleman reads the Hansard reports of our proceedings in Committee, he will find that we fairly balanced out the examples that we presented. I shall give the hon. Gentleman a few more examples shortly. I shall think of as many as I can while I am on my feet. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if on this occasion I do not promise to write to him with a series of examples.

I gave the example of a collection for an office party because the amendment is s incredibly wide in its definition. It reads:

"the collection by the worker of amounts payable in connection with".

That embraces any aspect of a worker's employment. I gave an example — the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar plays this game, too—which was extreme, but there are others.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The example of a collection for an office party was absurd.

Mr. Trippier: If that was absurd, what about this one? Let us suppose that an employee collects the wages from the bank——

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Trippier: I must complete my example.

Let us suppose that an employee collects the wages from the bank for distribution by the employer. What about the collection of trade union dues?

Mr. Eastham: I am obliged to the Minister for giving us the example of an employee going to a bank to collect the wages. I thought that security firms were used to undertake such dangerous and precarious tasks. What is happening these days? Are employees expected to collect a few thousand quid for their employers and to be at risk if the money is lost? Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Trippier: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman has advanced that argument. One of the reasons for repealing the Truck Acts was to try to pay employees in a cashless form. I think that I have given a good example. The hon. Member for Colne Valley has directed attention to "any" in the context of anything that could be linked with employment. Surely the example that I gave to the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar initially was very fair.

Ms. Clare Short: If someone is sent to the bank to collect the wages and some of the money disappears, is the Minister suggesting that that person will be dealt with by means of a deduction from his wages rather than by calling in the police? I think that is another absurd example.

Mr. Trippier: I am not responsible for tabling the amendment that we are now considering. I honestly think that Opposition Members should have considered more carefully what they are tabling. The hon. Lady seems to suggest that it is a good thing——

Mr. Evans: The Minister's stupid examples prove that he cannot even grasp the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Trippier: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, on such matters he is not quite the expert; he has not been as involved in the legislation as some of his hon. Friends. I welcome his interventions on most occasions, but on this occasion, as the intervention was from a sedentary position, perhaps he will allow me to refer to another example, although that is hazardous, because, after every example I now give, someone will leap up and try to question it. The point that I am trying to make is that there are so many different examples that one could give because the amendment is so wide.

Mr. Thurnham: As we are thinking of examples, may I remind my hon. Friend of an example that we discussed in Committee of a company that was controlled by the previous Labour Government, Sealand Petroleum Ltd., which had the largest policy of deductions of any of the firms that we considered? It deducted 25 per cent. of pay.

Mr. Trippier: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. When the hon. Member for Blackley made his speech, he said that I was trying to make the measure sound good, and so on. He referred several times to the word "protection". I have used it in my speeches many times in Committee. But the law as it presently stands, before the Bill becomes an Act of parliament, allows deductions to be made at the rate of 100 per cent. We are building in protection for people who are particularly involved in the retail sector by limiting the deductions to 10 per cent. on a pay day.

Ms. Clare Short: Why not apply the protection to more workers?

Mr. Trippier: The reason is obvious. We went through the consultation process—I referred to that on many occasions in Committee—and there was no demand for the protection to be more widespread. It is in retail employment that those problems have arisen in the past.

Mr. Eastham: In view of the fact that the Minister is choosing to go back on the old ground of our inquiry in Committee, may I remind him that we pointed out on numerous occasions that we objected most strongly that the employer could make an arbitrary decision to make deductions from pay? We said that he should go through the process of law and prove his entitlement. Under this proposal he will not need to have any other legal right than the Bill.

Mr. Trippier: We are in danger of rehearsing many arguments that we discussed in Committee. The truth is that the Opposition would accept—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, in his heart of hearts does accept—that we are building in added protection for the worker with this part of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to admit that in Committee.

On this group of amendments, and specifically on the Opposition amendment, the hon. Member for Ladywood suggests that, as a result of the Bill becoming law, masses of money will be taken out of employees' wage packets.

Ms. Clare Short: And deductions will increase.

Mr. Trippier: Frankly, I have never heard so much nonsense. I believe that the reverse will be the case.

Ms Clare Short: That is speculation.

Mr. Trippier: It is speculation and hypothesis at this stage, but we would not introduce a piece of legislation such as this if we thought that that would happen. It is clear to any observer that this part of the Bill gives the worker more protection than he enjoys at the moment.

I ask the House to reject the Opposition amendment.

Mr. Mikardo: As the Minister appeared to have the leave of the House to speak for a second time without asking for it, may I assume that I have similar leave and put a point—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Why is not sauce for the goose sauce for the gander?

We have had another example of the Minister flapping around without direction—a bit like a pterodactyl that has strayed into the wrong geological age—as soon as he strays from the bits of paper that his advisers give him. We saw an example of that a moment ago with the Minister's nonsense about people going to collect money from banks. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) was right to make her intervention. Does the Minister really mean that if someone goes to collect money from the bank for an employer, gets mugged on the way back and the money is taken away, the employer can deduct that money from the employee at the rate of 10 per cent. every week?

12 midnight.

We are not dealing in theories. Unhappily, we know that many people have been mugged after collecting money from the bank. We are almost at the stage when it is dangerous to be a bank robber, because a bank robber is liable to be mugged on his way to the escape car after robbing a bank. The Minister is saying that an employee who may unwillingly and reluctantly go to collect money and who gets mugged will have the money deducted from his wages. How can the Minister call that a good example? Ye gods and little fishes!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the Question on Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 4 and then on the manuscript amendment. That should help the House to understand how this will be done.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 4

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTARY TO SECTIONS 2 AND 3

Lords amendment: No. 7, in page 7, line 1, leave out "whether or not" and insert "notwithstanding that".

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 8, in page 7, line 16, leave out

"receive any amount from the worker on account"

and insert

"recover an amount from the worker in respect"

No. 9, in line 38, at end insert

"; and references in this Part to the recovery from a worker of an amount in respect of a cash shortage or stock deficiency accordingly include references to the recovery from him of an amount in respect of any such conduct or event as is mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b)."

No. 11, in clause 7, page 10, line 25, leave out "section 121(2)" and insert "paragraphs (a) to (d) of section 122(4)".

No. 12, in line 27, leave out "and" and insert—

"( ) statutory sick pay under Part I of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982; and".

No. 13, in line 29, leave out "that" and insert "the 1978".

No. 32, in schedule 5, page 40, line 34, at end insert—

"1982 c. 24.	Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982.	Section 23A(2)."

No. 33, in page 40, leave out lines 35 and 36.

Mr. Trippier: Lords amendment No. 7 is designed to clarify the requirements of clause 4(3). The present wording of subsection (3) might suggest that, even if a payment made on or after the date of a worker's final instalment of wages fails to satisfy the requirements of clause 1(2), there is some merit in considering whether it satisfies the time limit in clause 3(3)(b). This is clearly undesirable. Replacing the words "whether or not" by "notwithstanding that" improves the clarity of the clause and makes it apparent that, if the requirements of either clause 1(2) or clause 3(3)(b) are not satisfied, there is no need to look at the requirements of the other clause. The amendment is intended to clarify the position to help employers and workers, and I ask hon. Members to accept it.

Lords amendment No. 8, which should be read with Lords amendment No. 9, was tabled in the interests of consistency and clarity. It brings the wording of clause 4(5) into line with subsection (4) of clause 4 by changing subsection (5) to read "the employer . . . is entitled to recover any amount from the worker in respect of a cash shortage or stock deficiency", rather than

"the employer is entitled to receive any amount from the worker on account of a cash shortage or stock deficiency."

The amendment thus ensures that language is used consistently in subsections (4) and (5). The two amendments together also clarify the extent of the protection provided by subsection (5) of clause 4.

12.15 am

The words added by amendment No. 9 at the end of subsection (6) of clause 4 make it clear that, in proceedings by employers to recover amounts from workers, a court is required to limit the rate at which it orders the worker to make payments to the employer so that the 10 per cent. limit is not broken if the amount which the employer is entitled to recover is in respect of a cash shortage or stock deficiency with its wider meaning, that is embracing deductions and payments on account of conduct leading to a shortage or deficiency. The amendments thus help the worker and close a small possible loophole. I believe that these amendments achieve the clarity we seek. They help to ensure that the protection given to workers by the Bill cannot be evaded, and I commend them to the House.

Amendments Nos. 11, 12 and 13 merely update a reference in the Bill to another piece of legislation and are of no consequence in terms of policy.

[Mr. Trippier]

There is a reference in clause 7(1)(d) to section 121(2) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978. This section of the 1978 Act will be repealed when a provision of the Insolvency Act 1985 is brought into operation next December. The amendments simply delete the reference to section 121(2) and insert other references which achieve the same effect.

Amendment No. 32 is a straightforward amendment. Section 23A(2) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982, inserted by the Health and Social Security Act 1984, schedule 7, paragraph 8, applies the Truck Act 1896 to agreements to make deductions from statutory sick pay. Clause 11 repeals the Truck Act 1896. However, as statutory sick pay is within the definition of wages in clause 7, the provisions on deductions in part I will apply to it. Section 23A(2) is, therefore, redundant and can be repealed. This is achieved by the amendment.

Amendment No. 33 is a purely technical amendment, which removes a provision of the Building Societies Bill from the list of provisions to be repealed by the Wages Bill. That provision amends the Payment of Wages Act 1960, which is itself repealed by the Wages Bill. The amendment is needed because part I of the Wages Bill may well come into operation before the Building Scocieties Bill.

In general, these amendments are all technical amendments tabled in the interests of clarity and consistent use of language, and to update redundant references. I ask the House to agree to them.

Ms. Clare Short: We welcome amendment No. 7 because it is another minor expansion of the protection afforded to workers. When the Bill was originally drafted, it provided that an employer could go back indefinitely in time to find stock shortages or cash deficiencies and then make a deduction. We sought a change in the Bill to limit to 12 months the length of time an employer can go back, which was some improvement.

We are unhappy that the Bill provides that the whole of a worker's final wage can be confiscated by his employer, and even more unhappy that sickness and maternity pay are included in wages that can be confiscated for disciplinary reasons. But this amendment at least ensures that when an employer seeks to take large chunks of a final payment of wages, he can go back only 12 months to find a cash deficiency or stock shortages.

As we said in Committee, there was a real danger that, after a worker had worked happily for an employer for many years, they might then fall out, and the employer might seek to penalise the worker who was leaving by going back over many years, claiming that there were shortages and stock deficiencies which it would be virtually impossible to disprove.

We also support amendments Nos. 8 and 9 which limit to 10 per cent. the amount a court can deduct for behaviour leading to a stock shortage or cash deficiency. Although it is only minor, it is a slight extention of the protection in the Bill.

I ask the Minister a question on amendment Nos. 11, 12 and 13. The Minister told us that the reference in the new legislation is similar to that in the old that has been removed. However, he has not specified what the differences are. If they are similar but not the same, it is important that we know what the differences are.

I have said that we object strongly to the inclusion of sick pay in the list of pay that can suffer deductions. That is referred to in another amendment. We fought the Government on that. We failed, in the past, to move similar amendments. The amendments are technical and simply tidy up the Bill. We have no objection to them.

Mr. Trippier: In response to the hon. Lady's question, there are no differences.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to.

Clause 6

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS RELATING TO COMPLAINTS

Lords amendment: No. 10, in page 10, line 7, after "of" insert "any provision of this Part"

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment was tabled by my noble Friend to honour an undertaking that he gave in Committee in the other place. It strengthens the provisions of the Bill from the point of view of the worker. The Bill as it was previously drafted made it clear that any agreement between an employer and employee that sought to exclude the complaints procedure would have no validity. The amendment makes it clear that any provision in any agreement that tries to exclude or limit the operation of any provision of part I will be void. The result is that no worker can come under pressure to agree to abrogate his rights as provided by part I.

Mr. Nellist: As the Paymaster General has said, amendment No. 10 makes void any provision in any agreement to exclude or limit the rights of a worker to go to an industrial tribunal in respect of the unauthorised deductions that appear in clause 5. The interesting point about the amendment and the industrial tribunals to which it refers is that during the lengthy debates in Committee the industrial tribunals were the life-line that the Government offered workers to deal with all the problems that we thought could arise from part I.

This afternoon, with my comrades, I predicted — I almost ran a raffle on it — how long it would take the Minister to refer to industrial tribunals. He did so in less than three minutes in his first contribution from the Dispatch Box. That is indicative of the fact that the industrial tribunal system is what the workers will need should there be any problems with the introduction of the legislation. Obviously the Lords amendment is designed to compound and expand on that premise put forward in Committee.

Committee Members argued against the amendment. The whole ethos of this part of the Bill is the presumption that a worker is guilty of an offence that has led to an alleged shortage. The Government say to such a worker, "Go and prove your innocence before an industrial tribunal." Therefore, an employer becomes the judge and jury. He decides whether a worker is guilty. A worker has to prove his innocence. That is a complete turning on its head of what I was taught in school. No doubt other hon. Members were taught that the basic concept of British justice is that a person is innocent until he is proved guilty. The Government have done a 180 degree U-turn, or S-bend, in their treatment of workers.

Committee Members argued—this is crucial to Lords amendment No. 10—that for workers to be offered that lifeline meant a loss to them of some enormity. It may be that as a matter of principle a worker wants to prove his innocence in an industrial tribunal, but he would probably have to lose a day's pay to take that opportunity.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): It may be two.

Mr. Nellist: As my hon. Friend says, it may be two. The geographical spread of industrial tribunals is not such that workers have only to walk to the end of their street to go to one. In many cases they have to travel miles, and that involves considerable travel expenses. It is not unknown for industrial tribunals to adjourn on one day and give a verdict the next. That involves overnight accommodation, and so on. Those were the basic points of disagreement. All those costs could be doubled if the worker, on a point of principle, wanted to bring a colleague from his work place as witness to back up his case.

Mr. Caborn: Does my hon. Friend agree that the pre-hearing assessments are doubling all these costs, because of the legislation brought in by this Administration? Because of the geographical spread of those involved, the hearing could take four of five days in respect of the limited amount that the employer is trying to take off the employee.

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend, with his great shop floor experience and experience of industrial tribunals, has anticipated one of the points that I shall make later. He has made a good point about the potential burdens on workers who exercise their rights. This clause carries a series of caveats because of the expense imposed on the workers.

As ever, even when we are lucky enough to have a few weeks between a Bill being passed in the Commons and being considered in the other place, parallel developments take place about which no one tells Committee Members. One matter to which the Paymaster General and the Under-Secretary of State did not refer, and which was not considered in the other place, has a great bearing on the amendment. I am referring to a press release put out by the Department of Employment on 18 June, entitled:

"Government seek views on industrial tribunal fee proposal".

It mentioned the White Paper, Cmnd. 9794, "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" and it contained a proposal to charge a £25 fee for every one using the industrial tribunal system.

In Committee the Minister gave the arguments for the industrial tribunal system, but the press release contains all the arguments against it. It states:

"The main problem employers have encountered with employment protection legislation is the cost and management effort required to deal with ill-founded claims to industrial tribunals which also result in considerable public expenditure though they may cost the applicant little or nothing."

I disagree with that. The press release continues:

"The Government are therefore considering introducing a requirement for applicants to pay a fee, perhaps £25, when making an application to an industrial tribunal. Such a fee would be refundable if an applicant won the case at the tribunal or a subsequent appeal, or if the claim were withdrawn before the date for a full tribunal was fixed."

On the one hand, despite the fact that the Bill is designed to presume their guilt, the Government are offering workers the chance to prove their innocence by going to an industrial tribunal, but on the other hand, they are seeking to discourage workers from using that mechanism by charging a fee of £25 before they put any evidence to the tribunal.

Mr. Mikardo: It is even worse than my hon. Friend says. The Government are not just discouraging people from going to the tribunals. They have built a barrier in a paper called "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers".

Mr. Nellist: That is absolutely true. It is a little difficult, because the press release and the White Paper do not make it clear whether all cases go before industrial tribunals or whether only unfair dismissal or sexual discrimination cases do so. In any case, the consultation period ends in September. Tonight we are asked to accept on our constituents' behalf the use of industrial tribunals with the possibility that, in a couple of months, the Government will bring forward their proposals to introduce a £25 fee.

Earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I raised our difficulties with you, because the Bill had received its Third Reading in the other place only last night and it was not until this morning that we saw the Government's final amendments when they were printed and available in the Vote Office. There has not been much time for people to get in touch with me.

This morning I received a memorandum which pertains to this clause. It was from the British Institute of Management. It is not normal for me to quote the British Institute of Management, but, as somebody once said, "any port in a storm". The BIM says that it does not think it is helpful

"to regard all cases lost at tribunals as ill-founded. Cases could be lost on technicalities. Tribunals did not divide claims into black and white, but judged from their experience where the balance lay. Such claimants should not be deterred from seeking justice."

I submit that passing this Lords amendment, with the implication of a £25 fee in a couple of months time before people can use the facility in the Lords amendment, is a discouragement and a deterrent to those seeking to prove their innocence.

The memorandum goes on to say that the British Institute of Management

"was not convinced of the necessity to introduce a fee for applications; it would be preferable to encourage more use of the existing pre-hearing system."

That was the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn).

The BIM added:

"It should be noted . . . that in a recent consultation with its members only 17 per cent. sought to reduce employment protection legislation."

Perhaps we might come back to that statistic on future occasions when, from the Dispatch Box, we are told what wide support the Government's measures have among British management for attacking the rights of workers and their trade union institutions and organisations.

All the way from 25 July last year, when the bones of the Bill were announced in this Chamber, to its appearing in a more structured form later in the year to a Committee being set up, the message of the Minister was, "Go to the industrial tribunals." We now find that people are being discouraged from taking that avenue.

Mr. Caborn: The cost factor of my hon. Friend's point needs underlining. In Sheffield in the past few days a case was taken to an industrial tribunal for wrongful dismissal. I have been involved in the case. The fees to the lawyers on one side were over £1,000. Therefore, about £2,000 to £2,500 was spent on lawyer's fees alone, and it never went through the door of the tribunal. If people have to defend themselves and prove their innocence before industrial tribunals, we are talking about considerable amounts of money. As I said, in the case to which I referred the sum involved was in excess of £2,500 without the tribunal even being involved.

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend is right. As these large sums of money are in themselves a discouragement, we may ask ourselves why there is to be a further £25 fee to rub salt into the wound and provide a further indignity to discourage workers from using industrial tribunals.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central mentioned pre-hearing tribunals. There are already financial penalties under the industrial tribunal system against certain categories of dismissed claims. Tribunals are already empowered to award costs where either party acts

"frivolously, vexatiously or otherwise unreasonably."

To complete my argument, I checked to see what case would define those two words. It is a relief to be able to say that I have the case in front of me. "Frivolous" and "vexatious" were defined in E. T. Marler Ltd. v. Robinson in 1974 as follows:

> "If the employee knows that there is no substance in his claim and that it is bound to fail, or if the claim is on the face of it so manifestly misconceived that it can have no prospect of success it may be deemed frivolous".

It goes on:

> "If an employee brings a hopeless claim not with any expectation of recovering compensation but out of spite to harass his employers or for some improper motives he acts vexatiously".

There are already sufficient definitions of frivolous and vexatious for the point to be dealt with, particularly at a pre-hearing assessment level, and to see whether a worker is genuinely trying to prove his innocence or is engaged on a campaign of spite.

Lords amendment No. 10 enhances the argument that we had throughout the Committee stage about the Government encouraging workers to use the industrial tribunal system. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), who is not with us this evening, unfortunately, was the only Tory Member who argued against the industrial tribunal system. He used the same arguments as the Minister and Paymaster General used in their press releases to back up the £25 fee. The Government are encouraging workers to use industrial tribunals, but at the same time are trying to discourage them by the imposition of the £25 fee.

A final indignity is that even if we pass the amendment and then the Bill, and a worker chooses the industrial tribunal to prove the innocence which, under British law, should be assumed from the outset, and wins the case, he can get back to work next morning and be sacked if he has not worked there for two years full time or for five years part-time. He cannot go back to the tribunal a second time, because he has no protection against unfair dismissal.

I advise workers to rely, not on the amendment, on clause 5, on industrial tribunals or on the injection of the legal process into the workers' movement, but on their traditional trade union organisation, because the strength of those organisations can protect them when employers act unreasonably against them by deducting money to which they are not entitled.

Ms. Clare Short: The points that my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) made about tribunals and the proposal to impose, in effect, a £25 fine on anyone who tries to go to a tribunal are important and relevant. They deserve, at some point, some comment from the Ministers whether they propose that the £25 will apply in the case of tribunal applications where people are complaining that a deduction has been wrongly made.

In Committee we talked at length about the fact that people will be subjected to deductions that will not only make them short of money—as we all know, workers in retailing are low paid—but cast a doubt on their integrity and honour. A relatively small amount of money might be involved — a £5 deduction, for example. However, the suggestion is that the individual has behaved dishonestly. He might feel deeply aggrieved and want to go to the tribunal to put the record straight and have his honour protected, but another barrier has been put in his way. In his defence of this part of the Bill, the Minister relied heavily on the ability of any worker to go to a tribunal. The introduction of a £25 fee leans against many of the undertakings that he gave in Committee and will not make it easy for workers to have access to a tribunal.

I am glad that the Paymaster General was straightforward in saying that Lords amendment No. 10 was the implementation of an undertaking given in Committee. We said that it might be possible for an employer to impose a contract on a worker, or make one with him that would remove the protections of the Bill, but we were told that would not be possible. The Government obviously had another look, decided that it would be possible, and introduced this amendment, so that it would be impossible for an employer to go behind the door and reduce the protections, limited though they are, that are afforded to workers.

Does this clause make it impossible for workers, through their trade unions, to get better protection than is afforded in the Bill? Does it work both ways? Does it mean that they must be subject to the 10 per cent. deduction, whether the employer wishes to impose it or whether they have the strength to impose further conditions? We welcome the change. It implements an undertaking that was given at our request, but I should be grateful for an answer on that point.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The press release that was quoted by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) invited comments as part of the consultation process upon our proposal to introduce a returnable fee of £25 for those who wish to apply to industrial tribunals. I listened with great care to his speech and regard it as an interesting contribution to the consultation process that is now under way. As it happens, this amendment has nothing whatever to do with access to industrial tribunals. That is already provided for and protected by the provisions of the Bill.

This amendment was moved in another place to make it clear that, in addition to the protection already provided by the Bill, any attempt to reach an agreement between an employer and an employee that seeks to set aside or limit any provision in part I is void. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) welcomed that protection. It would apply only if an agreement was entered into between an employer and an employee that sought to exclude or limit the operation of part I. I do not believe that any agreement that gave additional protection to the employee would fall foul of that provision. It would be open to the employer to give greater protection to the employee than is provided for by the Bill, if he so wishes.

Ms. Clare Short: But if workers reach an agreement that there will be no deductions in certain circumstances, it will limit the provisions of the Bill which allow for deductions in those circumstances.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Deductions are lawful only if there is an agreement in the first place between the employer and the employee which allows them. If the contract of employment does not allow for deductions, all it means is that the Bill does not apply. This amendment in no way weakens the protection that is given to an employee.

Clause 14

WAGES ORDERS

Lords amendment: No. 14, in page 16, line 1, leave out "section 17(4)" and insert

"section (Computation of remuneration) (2(b) and 3(b)"

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following Lords amendments: No. 16, in clause 16, page 18, leave out lines 12 to 32 and insert—

"16.—(1) If, in the case of any worker to whom an order under section 14 applies, the amount of remuneration paid to the worker by his employer in respect of any week is less than the statutory minimum remuneration provided for him by the order in respect of that week, the worker shall be taken to be entitled under his contract to be paid the difference between those two amounts as additional remuneration in respect of that week."

No. 17 in page 18, line 33, leave out "relation to" and insert "respect of"

No. 18, in page 18, line 34, leave out "remuneration not less than" and insert

"an amount of remuneration equal to, or exceeding,"

No. 19, in page 19, line 16, leave out from "(a)" to "by" in line 19 and insert

"the statutory minimum remuneration provided for the worker in respect of the week in question"

No. 20, in page 19, line 21, leave out "actually so paid" and insert "paid to the worker"

No. 21, in page 19, line 42, at end insert—

"( ) Any reference in this section, in relation to a worker, to remuneration or statutory minimum remuneration in respect of a week shall be construed as a reference to remuneration or statutory minimum remuneration in respect of the following, namely—

(a) in the case of a time worker, time worked by the worker in that week, and

(b) in the case of a piece worker—

(i) work executed by the worker in that week, and

(ii) any such time as is mentioned in section 15(4) occurring during that week."

No. 22, after Clause 16 insert the following new clause—

Computation of remuneration

" .—(1) For the purpose of determining, for the purposes of this Part, the amount of remuneration paid to a time worker by his employer in respect of time worked by the worker in any week there shall be added together—

(a) the total amount of any money payments made by the employer to the worker, on or before the relevant pay day, by way of remuneration in respect of time worked by him in that week, and

(b) the total amount of any deductions made by the employer (whether in accordance with Part I or not) when making the payment of wages which consisted of or included those money payments, apart from deductions falling to be left out of account under this paragraph by virtue of subsection (2), and then, from the aggregate of those amounts, there shall be subtracted the aggregate of—

(i) the worker's necessary expenditure in connection with his employment to the extent that such expenditure consists of payments to persons other than the employer, is attributable to that week and is not met, or designed to be met, by an allowance paid to him by the employer, and

(ii) the total amount of any payments received from the worker by the employer (whether in accordance with Part I or not) and falling to be taken into account under this paragraph by virtue of subsection (3).

(2) The following deductions shall be left out of account under subsection (1)(b), namely—

(a) any deduction in respect of the worker's necessary expenditure in connection with his employment to the extent that the deduction is attributable to the week in question,

(b) any deduction in respect of the provision of living accommodation for the worker by the employer to the extent that the deduction exceeds any limit for the time being in force in relation to the worker by virtue of section 14(1)(c), and

(c) subject to subsection (4), any other deduction made by the employer for his own use and benefit (and accordingly not attributable to any amount paid or payable by him to any other person, or to any authority, on behalf of the worker).

(3) The following payments by the worker shall be taken into account under subsection (1)(ii), namely—

(a) any payment in respect of the worker's necessary expenditure in connection with his employment to the extent that the payment is attributable to the week in question,

(b) any payment due from the worker in that week in respect of the provision of living accommodation for him by the employer to the extent that the payment exceeds any limit for the time being in force in relation to the worker by virtue of section 14(1)(c), and

(c) subject to subsection (4), any other payment due from the worker in that week and retained by the employer for his own use and benefit (and accordingly not attributable to any amount paid or payable by him to any other person, or to any authority, on behalf of the worker).

(4) Subsections (2)(c) and (3)(c) do not apply—

(a) to deductions made or payments received by the employer on account of any of the following matters, namely—

(i) any conduct of the worker or any other event in respect of which he (whether together with any other workers or not) has any contractual liability,

(ii) any advance under an agreement for a loan or any advance of wages, or

(iii) the purchase by the worker of any shares or other securities or of any share in a partnership; or

(b) to deductions made or payments received by the employer on account of any goods or services supplied by the employer with the worker's prior agreement or consent to the extent that any such deductions or payments do not result in the employer recovering from the worker an amount exceeding the cost to the employer of supplying the goods or services in question; and accordingly any such deductions shall not be left out of account under subsection (1)(b) and any such payments shall not be taken into account under subsection (1)(ii).

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4)(b) the cost to an employer of supplying any goods or services shall—

(a) where he supplies goods or services of the kind in question in the course of his business, be taken to be the amount which he would have obtained for the goods or services if they had been supplied in the course of that business; and

(b) in any other case, be taken to be the amount of expenditure incurred by the employer in connection with the supply by him of the goods or services.

(6) The preceding provisions of this section shall apply to a piece worker as they apply to a time worker but as if, in subsection (1), any reference to remuneration in respect of time worked by the worker in any week were a reference to remuneration in respect of—

(a) work executed by him in any week, and

(b) any such time as is mentioned in section 15(4) that occurs during the week.

(7) In this section—

"deduction" does not include any such deficiency in the payment of wages as is mentioned in section 8(3);

"money payment" means—

(a) a payment in cash,

(b) a payment by cheque or by a money or postal order issued by the Post Office, or

(c) a payment (however effected) into any account kept with a bank or other institution;

"relevant pay day", in relation to any week of a worker's employment, means the day on which his remuneration in respect of that week is payable;

"wages" has the same meaning as in Part I."

No. 23, in clause 17, page 20, line 7, leave out Clause 17.

No. 27, in clause 19, in page 23, line 44, after "of" an amount of"

Mr. Trippier: This group of amendments relates to the enforcement of wages orders and the method of calculation of remuneration to be regarded as paid to the worker for the purposes of comparison with the statutory remuneration due under the order. They are technical amendments. I hope that the House will accept them.

Mr. Nellist: I want to use this as an illustration of a point that has been made twice before this evening. We are debating new clause 17.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are debating the Lords amendments. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will stick to them.

Mr. Nellist: These amendments have the effect of introducing new clause 17. It renumbers the clauses and alters the operation of the former clause in the Bill when it left this House.

There was very little debate in the other place on this group of amendments. It amounts to four columns of debate in the Official Report. The typeface of the Official Report in the other place is significantly larger than that of this House. The printing of the new clause took up a further two and a half columns. A further column dealt with requests from various peers for notes on clauses. At that point Lord McCarthy said that he had not yet understood the amendments to the clause. He has wide experience of industrial law and industrial relations law. If, over the days and weeks of debate in the Lords, he could not understand it, how can we be exepected to understand it in nine or 10 hours today?

On Report in the Lords, this group of amendments was briefly discussed in a debate covering three columns of Hansard. Lord McCarthy said:

"We feel that it is still a most dreadfully written and complicated clause."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 8 July 1986; vol. 478, c. 244.]

12.45 am

The reason for all the points of order yesterday and today is that last night in the Lords on Third Reading, this group of amendments was subject to further Government amendments to tidy up the introduction of new clause 17 which defines wages. Even the Government failed to understand what they were doing in early July, and last night in the Lords they were still amending the Bill. Despite that, we are expected in a few hours to comprehend and grasp everything they have done. The Government spent last night clarifying and improving the Bill by tabling this group of amendments. That is further proof of the justice of the points of order that we raised. This is a totally unacceptable way for the people that we represent, low-paid workers, to have their future decided.

Ms. Clare Short: We all know that it is late and none of us wants to stay up any longer than necessary. I am surprised that the Minister did not talk at rather greater length about new clause 17. It is an extremely important clause, and without further comment he simply said that they are technical amendments and told us that he assumed they are acceptable.

I have the same difficulties as my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) about new clause 17. I have tried to go through it and it seems to be an improvement on old clause 17, but I not sure of that because I have not had enough time to give it close scrutiny. It needs to be scrutinised in Committee, when we could go through it line by line and delve into it. When we scrutinised the other parts of the Bill in Committee we came up with all sorts of inadequacies and the Government made a number of changes. I fear that there are probably loopholes and faults in new clause 17 which none of us have had time properly to scrutinise.

It is welcome in new clause 17 that necessary expenditure in the course of a worker's employment on such items as tools and clothing that he might have to wear in his employment is deducted before it is decided whether or not the rate he is being paid is the statutory minimum. It is also welcome that any excessive charges for accommodation should be excluded, although I find that provision odd, because under the provisions of the Bill wages councils have power to set limits to the charges for accommodation for those over 21.

In future we expect to see under-21-year-olds being charged for accommodation when they work, for example, in a hotel at a rate well above that charged to the adults whom they work alongside. That would be a major injustice. Given that it would be illegal to overcharge, it seems odd that that provision has been included, but perhaps there is some explanation for that.

I am afraid I have another query on new clause 17(4). The notes circulated by the Department of Employment tell us that if a deduction is made for "any conduct of the worker or any event for which he is contractually liable, either personally or along with other workers. This includes disciplinary deductions such as fines for lateness, recompense for damage to the employer's property, etc" such a deduction would not be included in a reference to the statutory minimum wages council. Why is that so? Why are deductions of that sort not to be counted in calculating the national minimum wage? That seems wrong and inappropriate.

It is obviously right that there is a provision in the new clause which means that workers cannot in future be paid in truck by being given some of the goods that they produce. That practice is growing in my constituency in the new appalling low-paying sweatshops that are springing up in the west midlands. Some of the Asian women working in those sweatshops are given a number of garments at the end of the week together with measly and illegal sums of money. The garments are supposed to count towards their wages. There is a provision that says that vouchers and things like that which are given to workers and which can be exchanged for goods will not count towards the statutory minimum wage. That is obviously a good thing.

It is ironical that we have been told throughout discussions on the Bill that the Government are in favour of simplification so that wages councils orders can be understood by everyone, and then we have clause 17 which is horrendously complicated and difficult to understand. I am sure that many lawyers will make a lot of money out of it on the backs of the low-paid workers who will be paid even less in future as a consequence of the Bill.

Mr. Wainwright: Whatever the purpose of the amendment — the Government would have us believe that it is benign—it undoubtedly adds further obscurity to an already incomprehensible clause. That should not be tolerated even at this hour and under the extraordinary time pressure which the Government have thought fit to inflict upon the House.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has said, the lengthy language of the findings of some wages councils in the past is positively lucid compared with this and one or two other clauses in part II. So the Government's case that they are somehow getting rid of a lot of bureaucratic language and introducing a simple system is bogus and will be seen to be bogus when the Act is circulated to employers.

We must ask the reason for this obscurity. I acquit Ministers of revelling in obscurity for its own sake, but there is no doubt that the obscurity arises because the Government are determined to cast a death spell over the whole system of wages councils. Rather than honestly abolish them, because that would have provoked some of the kinder Conservative Members to expostulate, they are slowly poisoning them by the grotesque device of confining wages councils to single awards only. Only a Government steeped in early Victorian attitudes could possibly suppose that single awards could conceivably even begin to cover the vast complexity of modern industrial and commercial arrangements.

Having once set out on the demeaning path of confining wages councils to single awards and single hourly rates, the Government have been caught up in a web of bureaucratic language. I confidently predict that even this amendment will not put matters right. This will not be an effective part of the statute and the courts will soon ridicule—as I hope the courts always will ridicule bad legislation—the manifest defects of this unfortunate part of the Bill. It is only with a heavy heart that one can even begin to contemplate accepting the amendment.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I rise to agree with much of what has just been said. The clause is particularly difficult to understand and I am amazed to find it at a time when we are doing everything possible to reduce the complexity of legislation, particularly when it affects people who are often at a considerable disadvantage. One must bear in mind that such legislation impinges on the daily lives of people who often do not have the advantage of being able to understand the law. That is therefore all the more reason why it should be less complicated.

I speak as one who has taken a considerable interest in trying to reduce the obscurity and complexity of the law. In a previous incarnation I had some responsibility for drafting legislation. Indeed, I helped to draft the Small Business Bill, and it took only two clauses — [Interruption.] But there is a serious point to be made despite the somewhat cynical attitude displayed by Opposition Members, including one of my colleagues on the European Legislation Committee. I am sure that he will acknowledge that I have repeatedly spoken about the obscurity of legislation.

I am anxious to ensure that we simplify the law. Ordinary people, particularly those who are less well off and less advantaged than others, find that it is not easy to gain access to legal advice, which is often expensive. They should at least be able to understand the provisions in question. I urge the Government to consider what the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) has said. I agreed with much of it.

Mr. Mikardo: I rise briefly to respond to what the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said about the obscurity of this legislation and to what the hon. Member for Colne Valley called the horrendously complicated nature of it.

Subsection (1) of the new clause consists of a single sentence of 232 words. It should go into the "Guinness Book of Records". I defy anyone to disentangle a single sentence of 232 words, especially if it begins not with a principal clause, but with a sub-clause, and then a sub-sub-clause within the sub-clause in the very first line. It starts with a parenthesis and a parenthesis within the parenthesis in the first line, which consists of only 10 words or so, and then goes on for another 222 words before reaching the main clause.

Those of us who were taught parsing and about Nesfield and the purity of the English language cannot begin to understand. The hon. Member for Stafford was right to say that we should try to draft legislation so that the ordinary chap does not have to pay a lawyer £1,000 to go to court to discover its meaning.

Mr. Wainwright: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Lords amendment No. 14 either has one parenthesis mark too many or one too few? It is clear from the second line of the amendment that there is an opening bracket but no closing one. Will the Government explain their drafting?

Mr. Mikardo: We had a similar example earlier. It is a bit much if ordinary workers are supposed to understand and to rely for their protection on that sort of language. I know that it is not easy to draft legislation, but I cannot believe that it is beyond the wit of parliamentary draftsmen to split 232 words into three "short" sentences of 80 words apiece, which would be surely long enough.

Mr. Trippier rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again? I take it that he has.

I am

Mr. Trippier: It is probably stretching credulity to breaking point for the House to believe, as the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) has suggested, that the man in the street is expected to understand Bills or Acts. I have never believed that, but I am sympathetic to many of the arguments which have been advanced by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

When the Bill was in Committee, no complaint was made about the complexity of the clause. References to the Hansard reports of the debates in Committee will make that clear. Opposition Members were concerned because they did not believe that the Government were protecting workers. That was the issue raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). They did not accept that workers were being protected in the way that I suggested in Committee and I agreed to reconsider the clause. The main reason for presenting the clause in its proposed form—it would be silly of me to deny that it is more complex now—is to meet the objections made by Opposition Members in Committee, and many of those who are in their places this morning were members of the Committee. An effort has been made to meet what they had to say about the unscrupulousness of some employers, which would be evident if they were to circumvent their obligation to pay workers any less than the statutory minimum laid down by the wages council.

The following are the four main changes which have been made. First, the calculation of remuneration paid now relates specifically to the amount paid to a worker for time worked, or, in the case of a piece worker, work done in any week, and to the deductions or payments made by the worker to the employer which have been made in or are attributable to the same week. Secondly, in accordance with the undertaking that I gave hon. Members in Committee, which is paid to a third party is to be subtracted from the amount of money paid to the worker by the employer unless this has been met by an allowance paid by the employer. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) was especially anxious that I should try to meet that point. Perhaps he will recall that and have an opportunity to express his thanks.

"the worker's necessary expenditure in connection with his employment"

Mr. Nellist: It is not that late in the day. I accept that we are grateful that we received the departmental notes yesterday, so we have had one day more to consider them than we had to consider notes at a previous stage in the Bill's consideration. The explanation of the necessary expenditure makes a division between travel costs in connection with the employer's business and travel-to-work expenses. Why do the Department and the Minister think that it is all right to take account of travel costs on the employer's business and not the employee's costs in getting to the business in the first place?

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman had listened—I am sure he did, actually—to what I was saying prior to allowing him to intervene, he would understand. If we are talking about outworkers or homeworkers, his case is somewhat weak. It would be travel to collect the work from where the homeworker would do the work. I was referring to the issue which was raised specifically in Committee.

Thirdly, provision has been made for any charge made for "any goods or services supplied by the employer with the worker's prior agreement or consent" to be an allowable deduction or payment, provided that the charge made does not exceed the amount that the employer would have obtained for the goods or services in the course of his business. That was another issue that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East asked me to meet, as did the hon. Member for Ladywood, and it has been met.

I apologise, especially to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who is as keen as I am to simplify on every conceivable occasion, for the complexity of the provisions that are before us. I hope that I can persuade my hon. Friend, if not Opposition Members, that is has not been possible to simplify and to meet the issues that were raised by hon. Members in Committee. I think that it is safe to say that if we have not been able to cover the loopholes to which I have referred, the ability of others to do so can be safely challenged.

I know that there is a compelling case, put by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar, when he asked how one expected the man in the street or the worker to read the legislation. Not only the average man in the street, but many Members of Parliament, do not understand the Bills that they are expected to consider on the Floor of the House or in Committee. That includes the hon. Gentleman. No one is an expert on that. The hon. Gentleman, on an earlier point of order, referred accurately to the fact that the whole Bill is complex. He is absolutely right; it is extremely detailed.

I again apologise to the House that we have not been able to cover the loophole without this precise wording.

Mr. Wainwright: Will the Minister give the House the correct version of the second line of Lords amendment No. 14, which, as it stands, is manifestly incorrect? A bracket starts that never ends.

Mr. Trippier: It must be a printing error.

Mr. Nellist: Resign.

Mr. Trippier: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is a matter of resignation. He must forgive me if I do not wish to meet him on that point, because the House is about to rise and I am looking forward to the recess.

The simple solution is to omit the first bracket. The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) should be satisfied with that, and I shall endeavour to meet him on that point.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 15, in page 17, line 19, after "time" insert "being"

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 26, in clause 19, page 22, line 20, leave out "has dealings" and insert "is dealing"

No. 28, in clause 25, page 27, line 4, leave out "under his contract"

No. 29, in page 27, line 9, at end insert
"and "employed", in relation to a worker, accordingly means employed under his contract;"

Mr. Trippier: I am sure that these amendments will be widely and warmly welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I ask the House to accept them.

New Clause

APPORTIONMENT OF REMUNERATION

Lords amendment: No. 24, after clause 17, insert the following new Clause:

" .—(1) This section applies where

(a) in respect of part of the time worked by a time worker in any week ("the relevant period") the worker is entitled to the statutory minimum remuneration provided for him by an order under section 14, and

(b) in respect of the remainder of the time worked by him in the week ("the remaining period") the worker is not entitled to any such remuneration or is entitled to any such remuneration by virtue of another such order; and in this section any reference to the worker's computed remuneration is a reference to the amount of the remuneration paid to the worker in respect of the time worked by him in the week in question as determined in accordance with section (Computation of remuneration).

(2) Subject to subsections (3) to (5), the amount of the worker's computed remuneration that is to be attributed to either the relevant period or the remaining period for the purposes of this Part shall, if not apparent from the terms of the worker's contract, be the amount which bears to the total amount of the workers's computed remuneration the same proportion as the relevant period, or (as the case may be) the remaining period, bears to the total time worked by the worker in the week in question.

(3) Where any particular amount falling to be added or subtracted under section (Computation of remuneration) (1) as it applies to any week is exclusively referable to the relevant period, the amount of the worker's computed remuneration to be attributed to that period for the purposes of this Part shall be determined by either—

(a) adding the unattributed balance of that particular amount to the amount to be attributed to that period in accordance with subsection (2) above, or

(b) subtracting the unattributed balance of that particular amount from the amount to be attributed to that period in accordance with that subsection, according to whether that particular amount falls to be added or subtracted under section (Computation of remuneration) (1); and a corresponding adjustment shall be made in the amount of the worker's computed remuneration to be attributed for the purposes of this Part to the remaining period.

(4) In subsection (3) "the unattributed balance", in relation to the particular amount in question means so much of that amount as is not taken into account for the purpose of determining the amount to be attributed to the relevant period in accordance with subsection (2).

(5) Where any particular amount falling to be added or subtracted under section (Computation of remuneration) (1) as it applies to any week is exclusively referable to the remaining period, subsections (3) and (4) shall apply to any particular amount as if—

(a) any reference to the relevant period were a reference to the remaining period; and

(b) the reference in subsection (3) to the remaining period were a reference to the relevant period.

(6) The preceding provisions of this section shall apply to a piece worker as they apply to a time worker but as if—

(a) any reference to time worked by the workers in any week were a reference to work executed by him in any week;

(b) the word "work" were substituted for the word "period" wherever occurring; and for the purposes of those provisions as they apply to a piece worker in accordance with this subsection the worker shall be treated as executing work during any such time as is mentioned in section 15(4)."

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendment No. 30, in clause 25, page 28, line 23, leave out subsections (3) and (4) and insert—

"( ) Notwithstanding section 14(3)—

(a) where a worker is employed partly for the purposes of his employer's business and partly not, nothing in any order under section 14 shall apply to the worker in his employment otherwise than for the purposes of that business, and

(b) where a worker is employed for the purposes of his employer's business both in an employment to which an order under section 14 applies and in one to which that order does not apply, nothing in that order shall apply to the worker in the second of those employments."

Mr. Trippier: Amendment No. 24 introduces a new clause that modifies the provisions of the new clause after clause 16, which we have discussed. It states how that clause is to be applied in cases where a worker's employment is only partly within the scope of a wages order, or within the scope of more than one such order. Essentially, it is a matter of apportioning the amount of remuneration calculated as paid to the worker between the in-scope and the out-of-scope work. The apportionment is to be made according to the proportion of time spent on work of each type, except where the worker's contract provides otherwise. In the event that any element of the remuneration is attributable wholly to work of one type, the calculation of apportionment has to take account of that fact.

Amendment No. 30 is related to the inclusion of the new clause after clause 17. As presently drafted, subsections (3) and (4) include the phrase

"nothing in this Part . . . shall be construed as applying".

The amendment replaces that with "nothing in any order under section 14 shall apply".

The amendment also qualifies clause 14(3), which would otherwise have the effect of making a wages order applicable to workers whether they were employed either fully or partly on work to which the order applied. The new clause, in effect, carries forward the similar provision in clause 18 of the Wages Councils Act 1979. I commend it to the House.

Ms. Clare Short: This is an enormously complicated provision, similar to the one that we have just discussed. Unfortunately, my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) is not here to add up the words and length of the sentences. It is all about how to calculate the relevance of the statutory minimum wage to workers who are partly covered and partly not covered by a wages council order.

Given that position, such complicated provisions are necessary. We put it to the Minister before we discussed the Bill, and I put it to him again now, how much better it would be to rationalise the coverage of wages councils orders. We gave the Minister example after example in Committee of workers, parts of whose jobs were covered by wages councils orders and other parts which were not so covered. The Minister also gave examples of someone who cleans as well as works in a shop who is covered by two different wages councils orders.

The Government's refusal to make any provision in the Bill for the review of scope to rationalise these anomalies is another example of the point made by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) that the Bill has a hidden agenda underpinning it—to phase out, minimise and undercut wages councils and make them less and less effective so that they will be brought into disrepute and can eventually be killed off.

The necessity for this very complicated provision is simply that the the Government will not rationalise the coverage of wages councils orders. We must accept that now, but the better remedy would be to ensure that most workers were covered all of the time by one wages council order and not to have people partially protected. There is the example of the post office in which someone working behind the sweet counter was protected but not protected if he went to sell the stamps. That ridiculous mess will not be put right because there are no provisions in the Bill to correct that position.

OBLIGATION TO KEEP RECORDS ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 25, in page 22, line 6, at end insert—

"(2A) Where any such workers are homeworkers, the employer shall notify them in the prescribed manner of the matters mentioned in subsection (2)."

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment fulfils a commitment given to the Committee to the effect that employers who make use of the services of home workers will be required, once the legislation takes effect, to notify those home workers in the prescribed manner of the contents of wages councils notices of proposals, of orders which affect them and of any other matters which may be prescribed.

I am confident that the Opposition will welcome the amendment, and I commend it to the House.

Ms. Clare Short: Of course we welcome the amendment. We know that home workers are some of the most exploited and under-paid workers covered by the Bill. At least the provision that requires employers to inform them of their rights will make it slightly more likely that they will receive their rights under the law. We welcome the amendment.

Schedule 2

CONSTITUTION ETC. OF WAGES COUNCILS

Lords amendment: No. 31, in page 34, line 26, leave out "3" and insert "5"

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment enables the Secretary of State to appoint up to five independent members to sit on a wages council, instead of a maximum of three as at present. The amendment has been tabled to enable the Secretary of State to make additional appointments to the councils where from time to time there might be difficulty in the independen members attending in adequate numbers. There have been occasions on some councils when it has been possible for only one independent member to be present when representations are being considered. Plainly that is unsatisfactory, and we therefore seek this power.

This power will be used by the Secretary of State only for those councils where the need arises. The power is purely discretionary and is unlikely to be used where the independent members of a council are encountering no difficulties. There was a debate in another place on this matter. I hasten to assure the House that the proposal is made purely for convenience, to ensure that the position does not arise where only one independent member is left with a key role to play in a council. We have no intention of using the power to pack a council with our supporters. The suspicions voiced by Lord McCarthy—I am not sure whether they were serious—in another place are groundless.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I inform the House that this amendment involves privilege.

Mr. Mikardo: I hope that the House will not agree with the Lords in this amendment. I understand and sympathise with the kind of problem that the Minister has described, where the matter is left to one chap because only he has turned up out of the three. First, members should not be appointed unless they give an undertaking that they will, barring illness or accident, be regular attenders at their jobs. If they take on the job, they should undertake to deal with it properly and regularly. Secondly, far too many independent members are appointed to far too many wages councils. Being an independent member of a wages council is almost like being part of a profession, and some people are members of several councils. One reason for poor attendance may be that one person is a member of three wages councils which are meeting at the same time. He cannot be in three places at once.

1.15 am

The Government must find people who will not take on too many wages councils and who can guarantee their attendance. The Minister says that he will use the powers only in emergencies, but the power will exist and he may not be the Minister for ever. Indeed, I doubt whether he will be the Minister for ever.

Ms. Clare Short: He is not even in charge of them. It is that other nasty fellow.

Mr. Mikardo: My hon. Friend is right. He is not in charge of them anyway. The power to appoint five independent members is a power to distort the entire structure and to weaken the influence of the representative members contrasted with that of the independent members. It would dilute the representative character of a council. The power should not be given to the Secretary of State, and I hope that the House will not accept the amendment.

Mr. Wainwright: On this occasion, I differ from the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). I believe that the Government have sincere motives for extending the number of members to five. I shall give an example which I mentioned in Committee. More than 12 years ago, I and my Liberal colleagues discovered that the wages council which dealt solely with lace workers, who were based almost entirely in and around Nottingham, had not even met for several years. There had been a total failure to call the council members together. When we investigated the matter, we discovered that the reasons were that the employers did not want it to meet, the trade union representatives had been conned into believing that the workers would lose their jobs if there was an adjustment in wages and—this is the nub of the matter—the independent members, or what was left of them, were lazy and did not wish to activate the council.

We must go behind attendance at a meeting and question whether there are enough members to ensure that the council can be called together. There is sense in the amendment, and I hope that Ministers will take the opportunity to assure the House that, under their regime, no wages council will be allowed to go for several years without meeting.

Ms. Clare Short: The Labour party objects strongly to the amendment. The notes circulated by the Department say that the people working in the retail industry called for it. Who are they supposed to be? The National Union of Tailors and Garment Workers is strongly opposed to the amendment, as is the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. USDAW said that, many years ago, it called for the appointment of more independent members because of the problem of non-attendance, but that the suggestion was that those additional independent members should be appointed by the trade unions and the employers. The Government are not complying with that part of the recommendation.

All unions believe that, given the absolute determination of the Secretary of State for Employment, in everything he does, to cut the wages of the lowest paid, he will have ulterior motives and will stuff the wages councils with so-called independent members who will be in favour of low wage settlements, which will make it more difficult for the trade union representatives to achieve reasonable settlements. That is the view of major trade unions in wages council industries, and it is the serious view of the Opposition. We are not just saying it or protesting. We watched the Secretary of State start off in the Manpower Services Commission, and have seen the damage that he did there and the damage that he continues to do. We do not trust him with these powers.

If members of wages councils are hopeless, moribund and lazy, the answer is not to appoint more hopeless, moribund and lazy independent members, but to appoint different people, to make appointments conditional upon attending meetings, and to push people off if they do not attend. Simply enlarging the number of appalling people who appear to have been members of the laceworkers' wages council, to which the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) referred, does not necessarily remedy the problem.

Mr. Wainwright: It is not a matter of failing to attend meetings but of a member of the council activating the process and ensuring that meetings are called.

Ms. Short: I understand that, but I am not at all sure that increasing the number of independent members from three to five will ensure that meetings are called. I understand the hon. Gentleman's reasons for supporting the amendment, but I question whether it would achieve the objective that he intends.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Clarke: It was the Retail Consortium which first raised with us increasing the number of independent members. It wanted to increase their number by agreement between both sides of industry, but that would rather contradict the definition of independent members. The problem arose because, in that council, there have been times when only one independent member has been present to hear the representations of both sides. That is unsatisfactory.

Ms. Short: If people are not attending or doing the job, does not the Minister have any powers to get rid of them and appoint more active independent members?

Mr. Clarke: We are not necessarily talking about lazy attenders or people who are not normally attenders. If somebody is spectacularly lax as happened in the case given by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright)—he gave a startling account of the affairs of the laceworkers' wages council—it would be necessary for the Secretary of State to appoint some more reasonable members. The best members can sometimes find it difficult to attend, however, and if there are only three members, that risk is increased. Every now and again, only one will be able to attend if there are only three members, but that risk is reduced if we increase their number to five. It is only a discretionary power, and it will be used only in those councils where that problem might arise.

The suggestion of an increase was supported by the chairman of the all-party group on retail trade in a letter to the Secretary of State.

Ms. Short: When?

Mr. Clarke: That was my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), who I think was writing as chairman of the all-party group.

Ms. Short: When?

Mr. Clarke: Recently—after the Retail Consortium suggested that we should increase the number of independent members. That is why the amendment was made. When it was tabled, we did not expect it to be controversial. It ought not to be. The hon. Lady claims that it would somehow pave the way for my right hon. and noble Friend to start misusing his power of appointment and to appoint people who are not genuinely objective or independent.

Ms. Short: Absolutely.

Mr. Clarke: I refute the suggestion that my right hon. and noble Friend would contemplate doing any such thing. Any Secretary of State has the power, if he wants to misuse it, to appoint anybody he wants as one of the three independent members. We shall try to find conscientious and independent members, and to increase the independent membership of councils in which there might be a risk of the number attending falling too low. On that basis, I commend the amendment to the House.

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS AND SAVINGS

Lords amendment: No. 34, in page 41, leave out lines 11 to 19 and insert—

"4.—(1) Where at any time during the period of two years ending with the date of an offence under section 16(3) of this Act an order under section 14 of the 1979 Act applied to the worker in relation to whom the offence was committed, or to any other worker employed by that worker's employer, section 16 of this Act shall have effect in relation to any such time as if—

(a) in subsections (4) and (7), any reference to any other failure on the part of the employer to pay an amount of remuneration equal to, or exceeding, the statutory minimum remuneration provided for a worker by an order under section 14 of this Act were a reference to any failure on the part of the employer to pay an amount of remuneration equal to, or exceeding, the remuneration for the time being fixed in relation to a worker by an order under section 14 of the 1979 Act or by a permit under section 16(1) of that Act;

(b) in subsection (5), the reference to the statutory minimum remuneration so provided were a reference to the remuneration so fixed; and

(c) subsection (6) were omitted.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (4) and (5) of section 16 of this Act, as they have effect in accordance with sub-paragraph (1), the following matters, namely—

(a) the question whether an employer has failed to pay an amount of remuneration equal to, or exceeding, that fixed by any such order or permit under the 1979 Act as is mentioned in that sub-paragraph, and

(b) the amount referred to in subsection (5)(b), shall be determined in accordance with sections 17 and 18 of the 1979 Act, and not in accordance with sections (Computation of remuneration) and (Apportionment of remuneration) of this Act."

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker With this it will be convenient to consider the following Lords amendments: No 35, in page 41, line 23, leave out from beginning to "and" in line 24 and insert

"an amount of remuneration less than that fixed by any such order or permit under the 1979 Act as is mentioned in paragraph 4(1)"

No. 37, in page 42, line 3, after "(1)" insert—

", or

(b) any right of a worker to any annnual holidays or to any holiday remuneration in respect of those holidays,"

No. 38, in page 42, line 10, after second "of" insert ", or in connection with,"

No. 39, in page 42, line 14, at end insert—

"( ) Without prejudice to the generality of sub-paragraph (1), an order under this paragraph may make provision in connection with preserving the effect of rights to which paragraph 5(4)(b) above applies."

Manuscript amendment to Lords amendment No. 39, in line 4, leave out "(b)".

Mr. Trippier: I wish to concentrate on amendments Nos. 36 to 39 because amendments Nos. 34 and 35 are technical, as I am sure the Opposition will accept. I shall also deal with the manuscript amendment now before the House.

Amendments Nos 36 to 39 relate to the accrued rights of workers to holidays and holiday pay at the date a wages order ceases to apply to them. Wages council workers are not entitled to paid holidays in their first year of service. The rights they accrue in each year are based on length of service and are allowed in the following year. Schedule 6 as at present drafted enables the Secretary of State to make an order preserving such accrued rights as at the date a wages order ceases to apply to a worker. As it would have been impossible to make such an order on the date of Royal Assent and for it to take effect from that date, provision was made for it to have retrospective effect. However, as workers under the age of 21 are to be excluded from the system from Royal Assent, problems are likely to arise in safeguarding their rights through an order made at some future date. The amendments therefore preserve the accrued holiday entitlement for under 21s as at the date of Royal Assent and for other workers as at the date the relevant wages order ceases to apply to them. The existing provision enabling the Secretary of State to make an order has been retained as a safeguard should it prove necessary at some future date to clarify the preserved rights provision.

The manuscript amendment seeks to preserve any other rights of workers under the age of 21 in addition to the accrued holiday entitlement preserved by amendment No. 39. The Government believe that it is necessary to exclude young people from the provisions of wages councils orders from the date of passing of this Bill. Any delay would have to be reckoned in terms of the number of job opportunities lost. We readily accept that holiday entitlement earned by service up to the date a wages council order ceases to apply to a worker should be preserved. That is only fair and proper. However, we do not accept that that exception should be extended to any other accrued rights.

Ms. Clare Short: Our manuscript amendment, grouped with these Government amendments, to which we do not object, draws attention to how badly those under the age of 21 are being treated under the Bill. They are to lose all their protection immediately it passes into law. The indecent speed with which the Bill has been brought from the Lords to the Commons means that they will lose that protection before rather than at the end of summer.

It is noteworthy that all other workers protected by existing wages councils orders will continue to be protected by the old orders until new orders are made under the Bill, but the minute the Bill receives Royal Assent those under 21 will cease to have any protection. That is the Bill's final nasty twist of the knife in the young.

The Government's case is based on an enormous falsehood — that a cut in youth wages will lead to a reduction in youth unemployment, and that high youth unemployment is caused by high youth wages. The truth is that youth wages are low by international standards and have fallen massively in the past few years as youth unemployment has grown rapidly. The experience of every developed country shows that when unemployment is rising, it rises faster for young people than for any other age group for obvious reasons: they are marginal to the labour force, they are seeking to join it, they lack experience, and when employers can afford to be fussy about whom they employ, they tend not to employ young people. That is the experience of the United States of America, France and Germany. Youth unemployment has nothing to do with the wages profile of young people in Britain.

The Government's real strategy is to cut everybody's wages. To achieve that, they attack the most vulnerable, seeking to push their rates down, because it is easy to attack women's and young people's wages. If the labour of such vulnerable groups can be made cheaper, they can be made to compete with other groups and used as a lever to push down everybody's wages.

A series of measures, intended to cut the wages of young people has been taken by the Government. They have deliberately used the youth opportunities programme and the youth training scheme to do so. The allowance was set at a low level and it did not operate in line with inflation. If the allowance had kept pace with the original YOP allowance, it would have been about £40. The Government deliberately used the community programme to get the young unemployed, in their desperation, to accept badly paid and part-time employment. The young workers scheme was designed deliberately to cut wages. That unsuccessful scheme has been replicated for an older age group. The cuts in benefits for young workers were intended to make them accept less in order to work.

1.30 am

One would have thought that any decent Government would wish to protect the young in the first stage of their working life. If one were asked which group of workers needed protection, the young would be the first on the list. They have not worked before, and they do not have experience in looking after themselves and their wages and conditions of work. All decent countries have minimum wages legislation for the protection of young people. Britain is the only country to move away from that. That is why we had to resile from the International Labour Organisation convention on minimum wage protection, with which many underdeveloped countries managed to comply. Britain will not do so.

Such a removal of protection for young people will not create a large number of new jobs. If the cut in youth wages were to have done that, we would have seen a reduction in youth employment because their wages have dropped considerably. It will be a question of getting young people into work by throwing their mothers out of work. The people who work in the industries that are protected by wages councils are overwhelmingly women, and low-paid women.

Unemployment runs in families. If one person in a family is unemployed, it is likely that other members of his family will be unemployed. Young unemployed people are likely to have other unemployed members of their family. In so far as this nasty measure will have any effect at all, a few young people might get jobs, but a number of women, mothers and other young people, are likely to lose their jobs.

Our amendment draws attention to the fact that the only protection the Government will continue to give to young people is to ensure that their accrued holiday pay will be paid to them. Young people are to be treated even worse than other workers who lose protection under the Bill. The existing wages councils orders will continue in force for some time for adult workers, but that is not so for youth. On the day of Royal Assent, all their protections will be removed.

I have only one pleasure when I contemplate the consequences of the measure. It will take some time for the Government's strategy to work — for employers to shift and cut the wages of young people. By that time, we will have had an election and we will have a new Government who will bring in a proper national minimum wage, with proper protection for young people, so that we can move towards a decently paid, decently trained and decent investment economy instead of the sweatshop economy that the Bill leads us towards.

Mr. Caborn: Of all the hours that the Committee considered the Bill and our previous proceedings, this is the most despicable debate so far. It symbolises the Government's attitude not only to young people but to British industry. Nothing shows more clearly the drive to a low-wage economy than this section of the Bill.

I concur with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said. The Government are driving down the wages of the under 21-year-olds simply to ensure that they will displace older workers, instead of training our young people, bringing them on to a decent wage level, and giving them protection. No other Western nation uses young people as fodder so it can have a low-wage economy. They look to young people as an investment for the future in terms of the training that is required by their industries. Anybody would think that Britain's industries have a wealth of trained talent. That is not so. The Bill will worsen that position. I hope that if the Labour party presses the House to a Division, which I favour, all those Conservative Members who cry out about British industry and its direction will join us in the Lobby.

Clause 1

PROVISION OF SERVICES AND GOODS CONNECTED WITH AGRICULTURE AND COUNTRYSIDE

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 4, at end insert—

"(2A) The provision which may be made under this section includes provision for the supply of such services and goods as are mentioned in subsection (1) above through any organisation; and the Minister shall establish an organisation through which such a supply may be made.".

1.35 am

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not intend to delay the House unnecessarily, but I do not think that you put our manuscript amendment on the Wages Bill to the vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): We have considered that measure. The amendment was not moved.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I moved it, Sir.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady spoke to the amendment, but she did not move it. I got the impression that the amendment was not to be pressed to a Division. We have passed that point now.

Mr. Gummer: The amendment seeks to meet the fears of Committee Members that there was no obligation to maintain an advisory service. The Government were determined that that should be a false fear, but, so that there would be no misunderstanding, this amendment was moved and agreed in their Lordships' House.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): To debate the Bill barely 24 hours after it was given its Third Reading in the other place is contrary to reasonable government. A clause on tenants' rights in Scotland has never appeared in the legislation before, and we are seeing for the first time a substantial number of amendments to the tenants' rights clauses. I protest, not to the Minister of State, but to the business managers who did this to him.

I welcome the slight move on the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service. The "may" and "shall" debate seems to have ended in a draw. The Minister "may" still provide services, but, if he does, he "shall" provide a structure and organisation to carry them out.

We want to put on record our opposition to the present cuts. We want a commitment that there will be no further reductions in ADAS, whatever the revenue charging. The first pilot scheme — the plant laboratories charging scheme — has led to an 80 per cent. loss in the throughput of work in those laboratories, which is not an auspicious start to the new regime.

The same is true of the statement by Mr. Bawcutt, the head of the new ADAS marketing unit, that the aim of ADAS is to improve the efficiency of agriculture through the market. Does that mean producing still more? If so, will it be in the larger public interest? We believe that the charging clause, as admitted by Mr. Bawcutt, had a big effect on staff numbers and morale. We believe that the farmers' reaction at the Royal show, where they said that they would not pay for the services of ADAS if they could get advice free from other sources, is not an auspicious start.

I have tried to read Lord Belstead's attempts to differentiate between a chargeable and non-chargeable service. I still think that this is a recipe for disaster. The advisory work should be done free of charge, as a contribution by the Government towards re-orientating the whole of British agriculture.

Mr. Deputy Speaker I have to remind the House that this amendment involves privilege.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I do not wish to detain the House for long, but I should like to place on record the fact that amendment No. 1 will at least give the Minister the power to carry on with the advisory organisation, and that is better than what we had previously. At least there will be some mechanism in operation. Perhaps in the future it will provide the possibility of a better service than we are being given in clause 1.

We would like to place on record the fact that we regret that enshrined in clause 1 are charges for ADAS services. We deprecate this very much. At at time when farming is up against it and farm incomes are the lowest that they have been for 10 years, the slapping on of charges for the very services that could rescue the industry is totally inappropriate.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): This amendment is a modest improvement on what was in the Bill when we first saw it. However, it must be said that it does not, of itself, describe how the Government intend to exercise their discretion to make charges. I had hoped that the Minister would use this opportunity to say something more about that. There has been considerable debate in another place about the appropriateness of charging for advice that is required to enable statutory obligations to be met. In another place the Government refused to accept an amendment along those lines. That has been a matter of great disappointment to the farming industry, which properly feels aggrieved that the Government have refused to make that change.

It is not satisfactory that a Bill of this kind should embody such a wide discretion without any indication being given of the circumstances in which the Minister may choose to decide that it is appropriate to offer services, advice or goods free of charge. Perhaps in answering this short debate the Minister will find it possible to say something about that, because the industry is hanging on his words.

I agree with the remarks made by the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) about the inappropriateness of putting such an important Bill and such important amendments before us without proper time being allowed to lapse for consultations and proper consideration of appropriate amendments. This is not a serious way to treat the industry. We will have more to say about that in the context of amendments which follow this one, which is a relatively modest change from the initial Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again? It appears that he does.

Mr. Gummer: I am pleased that some hon. Members have seen that this amendment, like almost every amendment before the House, is an attempt by the Government to move towards the Opposition and others in the criticisms that they have made. In that sense it seems sensible to debate them tonight, even though it is a short time after their Lordships' debate, to try to ensure that the Bill goes on to the statute book so that the benefits of it can soon be seen in agriculture. I believe it to be a benefit to agriculture that in Britain, as in most of the Common Market countries, it will be seen that advice should be as close to the marketplace as possible. Payment for that advice is part of ensuring that the advice that is given is commercially valued. That is a positive good, and not a disadvantage.

That positive good was dramatically shown at the Royal show this year, when we saw how the French and British advisory services operated side by side. What became clear to people, perhaps for the first time, was the extent to which other advisory services charge for the service that they give. In the House we hear hon. Members say how valuable those advisory services have been to those countries. I find it odd that we should be so unique that we feel that the only thing that is worth while doing is something that is done free. The amendment would be a valuable contribution to the closer working of agriculture and the market.

1.45 am

The need to get advice on statutory obligations is important. A large number of them are there to benefit the industry. It is not unreasonable that the industry should bear the cost of much of that, which is why we have seen to it that in future that is what will happen. The purpose of the clause is not to cast any doubt on the advisability or the wish of the Government to continue an advisory service. The intention is to make the advisory service more effective, more market oriented, and more useful to the farmer. As some doubt was put into the minds of the people because of the phrases in the Bill, we tried to insert into it a phrase that would give us the obligation to retain advisory services, while enabling the organisation to respond sensibly and quickly to changes in demand for particular goods or services. That is why the amendment should help Opposition Members who had that fear. I hope that the House will accept it.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the right hon. Gentleman go a little further in explaining his attitude to the statutory obligations? He said that some of them would have to be paid for. Does he have it in mind to make some exceptions to the general rule about keeping close to the market?

Mr. Gummer: With my natural reticence, I was making sure that I had covered all eventualities. It is reasonable to charge for advice on statutory duties where they benefit the industry.

Clause 4

CONSTITUTION AND FUNCTIONS OF HOME-GROWN CEREALS AUTHORITY

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 3, line 20, leave out "one" and insert "two".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 3, in page 4, line 17, leave out "of that subsection".

Mr. Gummer: Amendment No. 2, to provide for at least two independent members of the authority who would fill the offices of chairman and deputy chairman, was originally tabled on Report by the Opposition but not moved. However, two other amendments that flowed from the proposed change were moved and accepted, and it was necessary to tidy up the situation. Similarly, amendment No. 3 tidies up the drafting of the clause, removing part of it.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): It is probable that one of the reasons why we are debating this Lords amendment is the fast work by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when you were in the Chair on Report. You caught both the Minister and I on the hop, so the amendment was not dealt with.

We covered the point of the amendment in Committee. We were rather concerned that there would be one solitary independent member of the Home-Grown Cereals Authority who would also be the chairman. We thought that there was a need for proper representation of the independent public interest on the authority and for a guarantee for some back-up for the independent chairman, particularly when there might be conflict between the evenly balanced interests of the growers and the processors on the HGCA.

We welcome this minor amendment, and the guarantee that there will be at least one further independent representative on the HGCA.

Clause 7

CONSTITUTION AND LEVY SCHEMES OF MEAT AND LIVESTOCK COMMISSION

Lords amendment: No. 4, in page 3, line 20, leave out "one" and insert "two".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following Lords amendments: No. 5, in page 7, line 43, at end insert—

"(d) in subsection (6) (provision in levy schemes for persons on whom levy imposed to recover all or a specified part of sums paid by them from others) the words 'all or a specified part of' shall be omitted; and

(e) after that subsection there shall be inserted—

"(6A) Where a levy scheme makes such provision as is mentioned in subsection (6) above it shall —

(a) authorise the Commission from time to time to determine the proportion of the sums paid under the levy scheme which shall be recoverable;

(b) specify whether the Commission may determine that the whole of those sums shall be recoverable and, if not, the maximum proportion of them which they may determine shall be recoverable; and

(c) specify whether the Commission may determine that none of those sums shall be recoverable and, if not, the minimum proportion of them which they may determine shall be recoverable.'."

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

No. 51, schedule 3, in page 27, line 55, column 3, leave out "(4)" and insert "in subsection (4)"

No. 52, in page 27, line 57, column 3, at end insert "and in subsection (6) the words "all or a specified part of"

Mr. Gummer: These amendments are intended to introduce limited additional flexibility into the Meat and Livestock Commission's levy arrangements. As originally drafted, clause 7 gave the MLC the ability to include in a levy scheme special arrangements for particular parts of the levy. This will enable the MLC to make special funding arrangements for certain activities, such as meat promotion or research and development. In particular, it will enable the commission to stipulate that the two groups of levy payers—slaughterers and livestock producers—should each pay a different proportion of these parts of the levy in line with the industry's own wishes.

These amendments go a small step further by providing for the proportions payable by each sector to be fixed administratively within the limits laid down in the levy scheme. This will mean that where only minor adjustments are proposed the MLC will be able to act on its own initiative without having to go through the lengthy process of submitting a new or amending levy scheme. This seems to us to introduce worthwhile additional flexibility into the arrangements, but I must stress that the MLC's freedom of manoeuvre will be restricted by whatever limits are written into the basic levy scheme, which will be subject to the closest scrutiny by the industry, by Ministers and by Parliament. I am sure the House will agree that this is an important safeguard. Therefore, we have tried to introduce enough flexibility to make it a useful way of giving the MLC a chance to make small alterations while not in any way giving it a power which could be abused.

New Clause

CONSOLIDATION OF AGRICULTURAL MARKETING SCHEMES

Lords amendment: No. 6, after clause 10, insert the following new clause—

" . After paragraph 5 of Schedule 1 to the Agricultural Marketing Act 1958 (amendment and revocation of agricultural marketing schemes) there shall be inserted—

"5A. — (1) Where the Minister considers it appropriate to do so he may—

(a) prepare a consolidation of any scheme as it has effect with amendments ("the amended scheme"); and

(b) by order revoke the amended scheme and approve the consolidated scheme.

(2) An order made by virtue of this paragraph—

(a) shall state that it is made only for the purposes of consolidation; and

(b) may contain such transitional and consequential provision as the Minister considers necessary or expedient.".".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 50, Schedule 2, in page 26, line 5, at end insert—

"In section 2(15) of the Agricultural Marketing Act 1958 for the words "or revoked" there shall be substituted the words "revoked or consolidated"."

Mr. Gummer: This amendment is put in at the request of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. It enables consolidation to take place. In many senses, therefore, it is a technical amendment.

New Clause

VALIDATION OF APPLE AND PEAR DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL ORDERS.

Lords amendment: No. 7, insert the following new clause—

The Apple and Pear Development Council Order and the Apple and Pear Development Council (Amendment) Order 1980 shall be deemed to have been validly made notwithstanding that they were made by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food acting alone rather than by that Minister and the Secretary of State acting jointly.".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 26, clause 16, in page 14, line 32, leave out "section 13(12)" and insert "sections (Validation of Apple and Pear Development Council Orders) and 13(12)".

Mr. Gummer: At the time when the Government introduced this amendment my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food wrote to the hon. Members for Pontypridd (Mr. John), for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) and for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) in order to explain our reasons for introducing the amendment at a rather late stage. My noble Friend the Minister of State also gave a full explanation when moving the amendment in another place. Therefore, I propose to give only a brief summary on this occasion, unless hon. Members wish me to go into it in greater detail.

The purpose of the new clause is to remedy a technical fault in the making of two orders in 1980. Since the main purpose of the clause is to minimise possible difficulties for the affluent Apple and Pear Development Council, a worthy body that has the support of the British top fruit industry and, I believe, both sides of the House, I ask the House to agree to the Lords amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 8, in page 9, line 40, leave out subsection (2).

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 10, after clause 11, insert the following new clause—

'Rent arbitrations: milk quotas

.—(1) Where there is a reference under section 12 of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1986 (arbitration of rent) in respect of land which comprises or is part of a holding in relation to which quota is registered under the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1986 which was transferred to the tenant by virtue of a transaction the cost of which was borne wholly or partly by him, the arbitrator shall (subject to any agreement between the land-lord and tenant to the contrary) disregard—

(a) in a case where the land comprises the holding, any increase in the rental value of the land which is due to that quota (or, as the case may be, the corresponding part of that quota); or

(b) in a case where the land is part of the holding, any increase in that value which is due to so much of that quota (or part) as would fall to be apportioned to the land under those Regulations on a change of occupation of the land.

(2) In determning for the purposes of this section whether quota was transferred to a tenant by virtue of a transaction the cost of which was borne wholly or partly by him—

(a) any payment made by the tenant in consideration for the grant or assignment to him of the tenancy or any previous tenancy of any land comprised in the holding, shall be disregarded;

(b) any person who would be treated under paragraph 2, 3 or 4 of Schedule 1 to this Act as having had quota transferred to him or having paid the whole or part of the cost of any transaction for the purposes of a claim under that Schedule shall be so treated for the purposes of this section ; and

(c) any person who would be so treated under paragraph 4 of that Schedule if a subtenancy to which his tenancy is subject had terminated, shall be so treated for the purposes of this section.

(3) In this section—

"quota" and "holding" have the same meanings as in the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1986;

"tenant" and "tenancy" have the same meanings as in the Agricultural Holdings Act 1986.

(4) Section 95 of that Act (Crown land) applies to this section as it applies to the provisions of that Act".

Mr. Gummer: Hon. Members may recall from our previous consideration of the Bill the provision which would enable tenants to claim compensaton at the end of their tenancies in respect of the milk quota attaching to that land. The existing provisions in clause 11(2) were intended to ensure that the prospect of compensation for the tenant in respect of milk quota should not affect the rent of the holding. It was suggested in another place that although the provision contained in clause 11(2) was fine so far as the quota allocated by the Minister was concerned, it would not be fair to apply it to the quota that the tenant effectively acquired through a land transaction and transferred to the holding covered by the tenancy. This is transferred quota in the Bill's terminology.

We recognised that this was a point for which we should make provision. If a tenant has paid for quota it is reasonable that it should be treated similarly to a tenant's improvement and disregarded in assessing the rent. Amendment No. 10 does this.

Subsection (1) of the new clause, which is amendment No. 10, makes it clear that transferred quota acquired by the tenant is to be disregarded at a rent review. A tenant will not be charged rent on it because it will be treated in a similar way to a tenant's improvement. The original intention of clause 11(2) is preserved in the new clause by saying that transferred quota is to be disregarded. Subsection (1) makes it clear that quota allocated by the Minister is not to be disregarded. Thus, the fact that a tenant may be eligible for compensation in respect of allocated quota when eventually he gives up the holding will not affect the rent payable in the meantime.

Subsection (2)(a) of the new clause makes it clear that if an incoming tenant has made a payment to the landlord on taking over a holding to which quota is attached, this does not count as the acquisition of transferred quota. That is because it would not be appropriate for this legislation to intervene in private agreements involving a quite different type of transaction into which the two parties freely enter.

Subsection (2)(b) and (c) of the new clause also make it clear that the statutory successor or assignee of the original tenant who was there when the quotas were bought in and the head tenant of an original sub-tenant are to be treated in the same way as the original tenant. If the original tenant paid for the quota in connection with a land transfer, then his entitlement not to be assessed for rent on the transferred quota will pass to his successor. Hon. Members may recall this concept is similar to that already contained in the compensation provisions where the entitlement to compensation passes from the original tenant to the successor. This is to clear up what might otherwise have been an anomaly.

Mr. John: Although the major milk quota debate is to take place later, perhaps I could raise one point at this stage about greater flexibility, because I know that flexibility is the main aim of all hon. Members when dealing with milk quotas. As the Minister will know, because I have raised it with him, I am extremely worried about the sort of case where the tenant has made an exceptional contribution, such as the provision of fixed equipment or buildings, towards the building up of the milk business.

Although one cannot formally amend the Bill, special consideration should be extended to people in this special category. That could be done by the Minister making it clear that they merit special consideration. Perhaps he could also tell the arbitrators or the arbiters in Scotland of that fact so that when arbitrations come before them they will be guided by what the House feels to be the case: that where a tenant contributes substantially towards the building up of a milk business that should merit special consideration.

Mr. Maclennan: Although I accept that the proposal to require the transferred quota to be disregarded by the arbiter is sensible and a distinct improvement, the clause draws attention to the anomalies that are created by the concept of quotas allocated or transferred and excess and standard quotas. Although the clause is a modest improvement towards safeguarding the tenant's rights, I agree with the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) and I hope that we can return to the matter and discuss it at greater length in the debate on quotas.

Mr. Gummer rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker Does the Minister have leave to address the House again? I take it he does.

Mr. Gummer: I agree with the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) that it is most important that people understand exactly how they stand about quotas. I say to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) that any system that seeks to approach what is a matter of real disagreement—not just between tenant and landlord but between incoming and outgoing tenants—is bound to encounter difficulties. There is no way of getting over the difficulty that, for the landlord, the quota results in an increase in value but not necessarily, indeed rarely, does it result in any money in his hand. The money in his hand, if it is to be passed out to an outgoing tenant, must be gained from someone else, and the other person who can give it to the landlord will be the incoming tenant. Therefore, there is a real interest division between the incomer and the outgoer.

2 am

In those circumstances, we cannot avoid having a situation and a system which needs careful explanation and consideration, and that is what the area has been given. I know that the hon. Member for Pontypridd is concerned that there should be no misunderstanding. Therefore, I accept that there are cases where the tenant has taken over a non-dairy holding—for example, what really turns out to be a greenfield site—and through his own hard work and by investing his own money turns it into a flourishing milk enterprise. That puts him in a different circumstance from many others. In those circumstances the landlord has contributed virtually nothing except the land itself. I think that all hon. Members will agree that in such a case the arbitrator should take full account of what the tenant has done, so that the tenant will be credited with much the greater part of the quota.

I happen to be confident that the Bill, as amended in another place, will achieve that effect. Two distinct mechanisms operate to that end. First, there is the calculation of the standard quota. That calculation is now formulated in such a way as to make it clear that the tenant is to get full credit for management practices, such as milking three times a day or feeding high levels of concentrates — practices which will have boosted production in the base year above what one would normally expect. Quota earned by those practices will be excess quota—quota in excess of the standard quota for the holding—and the tenant will get 100 per cent. of the value of that quota.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): My hon. Friend will know that in another place my noble Friend Lord Stanley, a constituent of mine, moved an amendment which he later withdrew which was very much related to the disparity between the 500 litre difference between less favoured areas—marginal land—in Scotland, and that in England and Wales. The reply of my noble Friend Lord Belstead was to the effect that that would be a difference of no more than one fifth of 1 per cent. Can my hon. Friend confirm that that is the case? If the difference is so minimal why is it necessary to continue to have this difference of 500 litres?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not expect me to do other than to support that which my noble Friend said in the other place. To the best of our knowledge, the figures that he gave are correct.

There are differences between England and Wales and Scotland. We have sought to try to recognise those and my hon. Friend will be presenting to the House some of the changes which we have in mind which have gone through the other place in that respect. I hope that my hon. Friend will listen carefully to them. I am sure that he will see that, because the circumstances of land tenure are different, because the distribution of land on which dairy herds are found is different, because the proportion of LFAs which have dairy herds on them is different, the circumstances may be said to be completely different.

As is the custom in these matters, the proposals to deal with the problems are different to meet different circumstances. It does not help to suggest that we should not treat Scotland in the way in which we have done in the past, because the law in Scotland is different from that in the rest of the United Kingdom and it is also true that the circumstances of dairying are different.

That is not the only way in which we are trying to meet the demands which the hon. Gentleman put. There is a calculation of a tenant's fraction which is the tenant's share of the standard quota—in other words, that which is not affected by the excess quota calculation about which we have talked. That is simply the tenant's share of the total annual value of the holding, including the land, buildings and fixed equipment.

In a case where a tenant has taken over a greenfield site, the tenant's share will be high because of the basis of that calculation. All the buildings and fixed equipment will be his, so the full annual value of those will go into the calculation on the tenant's side. On the landlord's side there will be just the land. The annual value of the land is shown by the rent, which one would expect to be relatively low in the type of case that I am discussing. So the tenant's fraction of the standard quota will be substantial. When one adds it on to the excess quota, the tenant will be getting, under the Bill as it now stands, a very high proportion in total of the full value of the quota.

But I have been disappointed by a tendency in certain quarters to minimise the value of the quota compensation provisions. I have even heard it suggested that there is a de facto maximum cut-off for the tenant's fraction, and that valuers will never award more than a certain percentage. I heard that again about two days ago when I was speaking in Lancashire. But that is not so. There is nothing implicit or explicit that would warrant such an interpretation. I have taken the point, and I am determined that that interpretation should not be made.

It is important to be clear. To put people's minds at rest, I intend to write to the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and to the Central Association of Agricultural Valuers, putting it on the record that there is no cut-off, and that valuers are free to award as high a tenant's fraction as they consider appropriate. I hope that I have reassured the House that the Bill leaves arbitrators free to give full credit to the tenant, who has effectively done everything with the exception of providing the land.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I am extremely glad to hear that. Recently I had a meeting with my branch of the NFU at which those concerns were raised. People encountered considerable difficulties when the original milk quota round was going on, over the manner in which the tribunals adjudicated. Some people felt that it was unfair. Will the Minister influence as much as possible the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and others to ensure that those who are appointed are properly and fully qualified to deal with the questions, have the relevant skills——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Briefly, please.

Mr. Cash: —and are in a position to judge the outcome fairly on behalf of both parties.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right, that we naturally want to eliminate any sense of unfairness. However, he would probably agree with me that in so contentious a matter, where there is considerable concern among landlords and their incoming or outgoing tenants some will always feel hard done by. The same is true of the original allocation of quotas. It is most important that every effort should be made to ensure that there is no reason for that, although it may still occur. I hope that the House will accept that by agreeing to do this, I shall meet the particular concern that has been raised.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): I am a member of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and was an arbitrator for many years. The arbitration procedure is fair. People who are fully qualified are chosen to do the work. The unfortunate thing about the whole quota system is that the incomer—probably a younger man who has to go into the holding—is often forgotten. The more the outgoer has to receive, the more the ingoer faces. The incomer is often far worse off, because he has a very heavy burden in the amount of ingoing that he has to pay for everything else. I hope that that is borne in mind.

Mr. Maclennan rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had already addressed the House once.

Mr. Maclennan: I have not addressed the House on this amendment.

The House will have listened carefully to the Minister's words, which were clearly designed to reassure the industry——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I recollect that the hon. Gentleman has already spoken once to this group of amendments. He can only address the House once on this group of amendments.

Mr. Maclennan: With respect, I have not addressed the House. The Minister has tried to put the industry's anxieties to rest. For the avoidance of doubt, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there are a number of issues which the Minister raised which are certainly germane to a later——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman can address the House only once on an individual amendment or a group of amendments when we are discussing Lords amendments. It was within my clear recollection that he had addressed the House once on this group. If he insists that my memory is in doubt, I shall have to accept that.

Mr. Maclennan: I am sure that your memory is extremely good, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and at this time of night it is possible that mine is faulty.

New Clause

COMPENSATION TO OUTGOING TENANTS FOR MILK QUOTA

Lords amendment: No. 9, after clause 11 insert the following new clause—

" . Schedule (Scotland: Tenant's compensation for milk quota) to this Act shall have effect in connection with the payment to outgoing tenants who are—

(a) tenants of agricultural holdings within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act 1949;

(b) landholders within the meaning of section 2 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act 1911;

(c) statutory small tenants within the meaning of section 32(1) of that Act;

(d) crofters within the meaning of section 3(2) of the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1955, of compensation in respect of milk quotas.".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 49, new schedule, before schedule 2, insert the following new schedule—

TENANTS' COMPENSATION FOR MILK QUOTA: SCOTLAND

Interpretation

1.—(1) In this Schedule, except where the context otherwise requires or provision is made to the contrary—

"allocated quota" has the meaning given in paragraph 2(1) below;

"holding" has the same meaning as in the 1986 Regulations;

"landlord" means—

(a) in the case of an agricultural holding to which the 1949 Act applies, the landlord within the meaning of section 93(1) of that Act;

(b) in the case of a croft within the meaning of the 1955 Act, the landlord within the meaning of section 37(1) of that Act;

(c) in the case of a holding within the meaning of the 1911 Act to which the 1949 Act does not apply, the same as it means in the 1911 Act;

"milk quota" means—

(a) in the case of a tenant registered in the direct sales register maintained under the 1986 Regulations, a direct sales quota within the meaning of those Regulations; and

(b) in the case of a tenant registered in the wholesale register maintained under those Regulations, a wholesale quota within the meaning of those Regulations;

"registered", in relation to milk quota, means—

(a) in the case of direct sales quota, within the meaning of the 1986 Regulations, registered in the direct sales register maintained under those Regulations; and

(b) in the case of a wholesale quota within the meaning of those Regulations, registered in a wholesale register maintained under those Regulations;

"relevant quota" has the meaning given in paragraph 2(2) below;

"standard quota" means standard quota as calculated under paragraph 6 below;

"tenancy" means, as the case may be—

(a) the agricultural holding, within the meaning of section 1 of the 1949 Act;

(b) the croft within the meaning of section 3(1) of the 1955 Act;

(c) the holding within the meaning of section 2 of the 1911 Act;

(d) the holding of a statutory small tenant under section 32 of the 1911 Act;

(e) any part of a tenancy which is treated as a separate entity for purposes of succession, assignation or sub-letting;

"tenant" means—

(a) in the case of an agricultural holding to which the 1949 Act applies, the tenant within the meaning of section 93(1) of that Act;

(b) in the case of a croft within the meaning of the 1955 Act, the crofter within the meaning of section 3(2) of that Act;

(c) in the case of a holding within the meaning of the 1911 Act to which the 1949 Act does not apply, the landholder within the meaning of section 2(2) of the 1911 Act;

"tenant's fraction" has the meaning given in paragraph 7 below;

"termination" means the resumption of possession of the whole or part of the tenancy by the landlord by virtue of any enactment, rule of law or term of the lease which makes provison for removal of or renunciation by a tenant, or resumption of possession by a landlord, and in particular includes resumption of possession following—

(a) vacancy arising under section 11(5) of the 1955 Act;

(b) termination of a lease in pursuance of section 16(3) of the Succession (Scotland) Act 1964;

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

"transferred quota" has the meaning given in paragraph 2(2) below;
"the 1886 Act" means the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act 1886;
"the 1911 Act" means the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act 1911;
"the 1949 Act" means the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act 1949;
"the 1955 Act" means the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1955;
"the 1986 Regulations" means the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1986.

(2) For the purposes of this Schedule, the designations of landlord and tenant shall continue to apply to the parties to any proceedings taken under or in pursuance of it until the conclusion of those proceedings.

Tenant's right to compensation

2. — (1) Subject to this Schedule, where, on the termination of the lease, the tenant has milk quota registered as his in relation to a holding consisting of or including the tenancy, he shall be entitled, on quitting the tenancy, to obtain from his landlord a payment—

(a) if the tenant had milk quota allocated to him in relation to a holding consisting of or including the tenancy ("allocated quota"), in respect of so much of the relevant quota as consists of allocated quota; and

(b) if the tenant had quota allocated to him as aforesaid or was in occupation of the tenancy as a tenant on 2nd April 1984 (whether or not under the lease which is terminating), in respect of so much of the relevant quota as consists of transferred quota by virtue of a transaction the cost of which was borne wholly or partly by him.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1) above—

"the relevant quota" means—

(a) where the holding consists only of the tenancy, the milk quota registered in relation to the holding; and

(b) otherwise, such part of that milk quota as falls to be apportioned to the tenancy on the termination of the lease;

"transferred quota" means milk quota transferred to the tenant by virtue of the transfer to him of the whole or part of the holding.

(3) A tenant shall not be entitled to more than one payment under this paragraph in respect of the same tenancy.

(4) Nothing in this paragraph shall prejudice the right of a tenant to claim compensation to which he may be entitled under an agreement in writing, in lieu of any payment provided by this paragraph.

Succession to lease of tenancy

3. — (1) This paragraph applies where a person (the successor has acquired right to the lease of the tenancy after 2nd April 1984—

(a) under section 16 of the Succession (Scotland) Act 1964;

(b) as a legatee, under section 20 of the 1949 Act or under section 16 of the 1886 Act;

(c) under a bequest of a croft under section 10 of the 1955 Act, or following nomination under section 11 of that Act;

(d) under a lawful assignation of the lease, and the person whom he succeeded or, as the case may be, who assigned the lease to him is described in this paragraph as his "predecessor".

(2) Where this paragraph applies—

(a) any milk quota allocated or transferred to the predecessor (or treated as having been allocated or transferred to him) in respect of the tenancy shall be treated as if it had been allocated or transferred to his successor;

(b) where, under (a) above, milk quota is treated as having been transferred to the successor, he shall be treated as if he had paid so much of the cost of the transaction by virtue of which the milk quota was transferred as his predecessor bore (or is treated as having borne).

Sub-tenants

4. In the case of a tenancy which is sub-let, if the sub-tenant quits the tenancy—

(a) paragraph 2 above shall apply so as to entitle the sub-tenant to obtain payment from the head tenant, and for that purpose, references to the landlord and the tenant in this Schedule shall be respectively construed as references to the head tenant and the sub-tenant; and

(b) for the purposes of the application of paragraph 2 above as between the original landlord and the head tenant—

(i) the head tenant shall be deemed to have had the relevant quota allocated to him, and to have been in occupation of the tenancy as a tenant on 2nd April 1984; and

(ii) if the head tenant does not take up occupation of the tenancy when the sub-tenant quits, the head tenant shall be treated as if he had quitted the tenancy when the sub-tenant quitted it.

Calculation of payment

5.—(1) The amount of the payment to which a tenant is entitled under paragraph 2 above on the termination of the lease shall be determined in accordance with this paragraph.

(2) The amount of the payment in respect of allocated quota shall be equal to the value of—

(a) where the allocated quota exceeds the standard quota for the tenancy—

(i) the tenant's fraction of so much of the allocated quota as does not exceed the standard quota; together with

(ii) the amount of the excess;

(b) where the allocated quota is equal to the standard quota, the tenant's fraction of the allocated quota;

(c) where the allocated quota is less than the standard quota, such proportion of the tenant's fraction of the allocated quota as the allocated quota bears to the standard quota.

(3) The amount of the payment in respect of transferred quota shall be equal to the value of—

(a) where the tenant bore the whole of the cost of the transaction by virtue of which the transferred quota was transferred to him, the transferred quota; and

(b) where the tenant bore only part of that cost, the corresponding part of the transferred quota.

Standard quota

6.—(1) Subject to this paragraph, the "standard quota" for any tenancy for the purposes of this Schedule shall be calculated by multiplying the relevant number of hectares by the standard yield per hectare.

(2) Where by virtue of the quality of the land in question or of climatic conditions in the area the amount of milk which could reasonably be expected to have been produced from one hectare of the tenancy during the relevant period ("the reasonable amount") is greater or less than the average yield per hectare then sub-paragraph (1) above shall not apply and the standard quota shall be calculated by multiplying the relevant number of hectares by such proportion of the standard yield per hectare as the reasonable amount bears to the average yield per hectare; and the Secretary of State shall by order prescribe the amount of milk to be taken as the average yield per hectare for the purposes of this sub-paragraph.

(3) Where the relevant quota includes milk quota allocated in pursuance of an award of quota made by the Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for Scotland which has not been allocated in full, the standard quota shall be reduced by the amount by which the milk quota allocated in pursuance of the award falls short of the amount awarded (or, in the case where only part of the milk quota allocated in pursuance of the award is included in the relevant quota, by the corresponding proportion of that shortfall).

(4) In sub-paragraph (3) above the references to milk quota allocated in pursuance of an award of quota include references to quota allocated by virtue of the amount awarded not originally having been allocated in full.

(5) for the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) "the relevant number of hectares" means the average number of hectares of the tenancy used during the relevant period for the feeding of dairy cows kept on the tenancy, or if different, the average number of hectares of the tenancy which could reasonably be expected to have been so used (having regard to the number of grazing animals other than dairy cows kept on the tenancy during that period); and

(b) "the standard yield per hectare" means such number of litres as the Secretary of State may from time to time by order prescribe for the purposes of this sub-paragraph.

(6) In this and in paragraph 7 below—

(a) references to the area of a tenancy used for the feeding of dairy cows kept on the tenancy do not include references to land used for growing cereal crops for feeding to dairy cows in the form of loose grain; and

(b) "dairy cows" means milking cows and calved heifers.

(7) An order under this paragraph may make different provision for different cases.

(8) The powers to make an order under this paragraph shall be exercisable by statutory instrument and any statutory instrument containing such an order shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

Tenant's fraction

7.—(1) For the purposes of this Schedule "the tenant's fraction" means the fraction of which—

(a) the numerator is the annual rental value at the end of the relevant period of the tenant's dairy improvements and fixed equipment; and

(b) the denominator is the sum of that value and such part of the rent payable by the tenant in respect of the relevant period as is attributable to the land used in that period for the feeding, accommodation or milking of dairy cows kept on the tenancy.

(2) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(a) above, in the case of an agricultural holding within the meaning of the 1949 Act, the annual rental value of the tenant's dairy improvements and fixed equipment shall be taken to be the amount which would be disregarded, on a reference to arbitration made in respect of the tenancy under section 7 of the 1949 Act (variation of rent), as being—

(a) an increase in annual rental value due to dairy improvements at the tenant's expense (in terms of subsection (2)(a) of that section); or

(b) the value of tenant's fixed equipment and therefore not relevant to the fixing of rent under that section, so far as that amount is attributable to tenant's dairy improvements and fixed equipment which are relevant to the feeding, accommodation or milking of dairy cows kept on the tenancy.

(3) Where—

(a) the relevant period is less than or greater than 12 months; or

(b) rent was payable by the tenant in respect of only part of the relevant period, the average rent payable in respect of one month in the relevant period or, as the case may be, in that part shall be determined and the rent referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(b) above shall be taken to be the corresponding annual amount.

(4) For the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) "dairy improvement"—

(i) in the case of an agricultural holding or a statutory small tenancy, means a "new improvement" or an "old improvement" within the meaning of section 93 of the 1949 Act;

(ii) in the case of a croft, means a "permanent improvement" within the meaning of section 37 of the 1955 Act;

(iii) in the case of a holding under the 1911 Act to which the 1949 Act does not apply, means a "permanent improvement" within the meaning of section 34 of the 1886 Act.

so far as relevant to the feeding, accommodation or milking of dairy cows kept on the tenancy;

(b) "fixed equipment" means fixed equipment, within the meaning of section 93 of the 1949 Act, so far as relevant to the feeding, accommodation or milking of dairy cows kept on the tenancy.

(c) all dairy improvements and fixed equipment provided by the tenant shall be taken into account for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(a) above, except for such improvements and fixed equipment in respect of which he has, before the end of the relevant period, received full compensation directly related to their value.

(5) For the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) any allowance made or benefit given by the landlord after the end of the relevant period in consideration of the execution of dairy improvements or fixed equipment wholly or partly at the expense of the tenant shall be disregarded;

(b) any compensation received by the tenant after the end of the relevant period in respect of any dairy improvement or fixed equipment shall be disregarded; and

(c) where paragraph 3 above applies, dairy improvements or fixed equipment which would be regarded as tenant's dairy improvements or fixed equipment on the termination of a former tenant's lease (if he were entitled to a payment under this Schedule in respect of the land) shall be regarded as the new tenant's dairy improvements or fixed equipment.

Relevant period

8. In this Schedule "the relevant period" means—

(a) the period in relation to which the allocated quota was determined; or

(b) where it was determined in relation to more than one period, the period in relation to which the majority was determined or, if equal amounts were determined in relation to different periods, the later of those periods.

Valuation of milk quota

9. The value of milk quota to be taken into account for the purposes of paragraph 5 above is the value of the milk quota at the time of the termination of the lease and in determining that value there shall be taken into account such evidence as is available, including evidence as to the sums being paid for interests in land—

(a) in cases where milk quota is registered in relation to land; and

(b) in cases where no milk quota is so registered.

Determination of standard quota and tenant's fraction before end of lease

10.—(1) Where it appears that on the termination of a lease, the tenant may be entitled to a payment under paragraph 2 above, the landlord or tenant may at any time before the termination of the lease by notice in writing served on the other demand that the determination of the standard quota for the land or the tenant's fraction shall be referred —

(a) in the case of an agricultural holding within the meaning of the 1949 Act to arbitration under that Act or, under section 78 of that Act, to the Scottish Land Court;

(b) in any other case, to the Scottish Land Court, for determination by that court, and where (a) above applies, section 75 (or, where the circumstances require, sections 77 and 87) of the 1949 Act shall apply, as if the matters mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) above were required by that Act to be determined by arbitration.

(2) On a reference under this paragraph the arbiter or, as the case my be, the Scottish Land Court shall determine the standard quota for the land or, as the case may be, the tenant's fraction (as nearly as is practicable at the end of the relevant period).

Settlement of tenant's claim on termination of lease

11.—(1) Subject to this paragraph, any claim arising under paragraph 2 above shall be determined—

(a) in the case of an agricultural holding within the meaning of the 1949 Act by arbitration under that Act or, under section 78, of that Act, by the Scottish Land Court;

(b) in any other case, by the Scottish Land Court, and no such claim shall be enforceable unless before the expiry of the period of 2 months from the termination of the lease the tenant has served notice in writing on the landlord of his intention to make the claim, specifying the nature of the claim.

(2) The landlord and tenant may within the period of 8 months from the termination of the lease by agreement in writing settle the claim, but where the claim has not been settled during that period it shall be determined as provided in sub-paragraph (1) above.

(3) Where a tenant lawfully remains in occupation of part of the tenancy after the termination of the lease, the references in sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) above to the termination of the lease shall be construed as references to the termination of the occupation.

(4) In the case of an arbitration under this paragraph, section 75 (or, where the circumstances require, sections 77 and 87) of the 1949 Act (arbitrations) shall apply as if the requirements of this paragraph were requirements of that Act, but paragraph 13 of the Sixth Schedule to that Act (arbitration awards to fix day for payment not later than one month after award) shall have effect for the purposes of this paragraph with the substitution for the words "one month" of the words "three months".

(5) In the case of an arbitration under this paragraph, section 61 of the 1949 Act (determination of claims for compensation where landlord's interest is divided) shall apply, where the circumstances require, as if compensation payable under paragraph 2 above were compensation payable under that Act.

(6) Where—

(a) before the termination of the lease of any land the landlord and tenant have agreed in writing the amount of the standard quota for the land or the tenant's fraction or the value of milk quota which is to be used for the purpose of calculating the payment to which the tenant will be entitled under this Schedule on the termination of the lease; or

(b) the standard quota or the tenant's fraction has been determined by arbitration in pursuance of paragraph 10 above, the arbiter or, as the case may be, the Scottish Land Court in determining the claim under this paragraph shall, subject to sub-paragraph (7) below, award payment in accordance with that agreement or determination.

(7) Where it appears to the arbiter or, as the case may be, the Scottish Land Court that any circumstances relevant to the agreement or determination mentioned in sub-paragraph (6) above were materially different at the time of the termination of the lease from those at the time the agreement or determination was made, he shall disregard so much of the agreement or determination as appears to him to be affected by the change in circumstances.

Enforcement

12. Section 69 of the 1949 Act (enforcement) and section 70 of that Act (power of tenant to obtain charge on holding) shall apply to any sum which becomes due to a tenant by virtue of this Schedule as they apply to the sums mentioned in those sections.

Powers of limited owners

13. Whatever his interest in the tenancy, the landlord may, for the purposes of this Schedule, do or have done to him anything which might be so done if he were absolute owner of the tenancy.

Notices

14.—(1) Any notice or other document required or authorised by this Schedule to be served on any person shall be duly served if it is delivered to him, or left at his proper address, or sent to him by post in a recorded delivery letter or a registered letter.

(2) In the case of an incorporated company or body, any such document shall be duly served if served on the secretary or clerk of the company or body.

(3) Any such document to be served by or on a landlord or tenant shall be duly served if served by or on any agent of the landlord or tenant.

(4) For the purposes of this paragraph and of section 7 of the Interpretation Act 1978, the proper address of a person is—

(a) in the case of a secretary or clerk to a company or body, that of the registered or principal office of the company or body;

(b) in any other case, the person's last known address.

(5) Unless and until the tenant receives notice of a change of landlord, any document served by him on the person previously known to him as landlord shall be deemed to be duly served on the landlord under the tenancy.

Crown land

15.—(1) This Schedule shall apply to land belonging to Her Majesty in right of the Crown, subject to such modifications as may be prescribed; and for the purposes of this Schedule the Crown Estates Commissioners or other proper officer or body having charge of the land for the time being or, if there is no such officer or body, such person as Her Majesty may appoint in writing under the Royal Sign Manual, shall represent Her Majesty and shall be deemed to be the landlord.

(2) Without prejudice to sub-paragraph (1) above, subject to such modifications as may be prescribed, section (Scotland: Compensation to outgoing tenants for milk quota) of this Act and this Schedule shall apply to land where the interest of the landlord or of the tenant belongs to a government department or is held on behalf of Her Majesty for the purposes of a government department"

Mr. MacKay: These amendments introduce a new clause and associated schedule to the Bill to provide in Scotland for compensation by landlords to tenants in respect of milk quotas on the termination of the tenant's lease. The clause and schedule are broadly comparable to the provisions for England and Wales at clause 11 and schedule 1, which were introduced as amendments to the Bill by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and agreed to by the House on Report on 17 April. I hope that the House will bear with me if I explain the position surrounding the Scottish amendments.

As was the case for England and Wales, the Scottish provisions represent the outcome of a great deal of discussion between the Government and the agriculture industry, in particular the bodies representing the interests of landlords and tenants. These discussions were difficult and protracted and conducted against a backdrop of highly charged public debate. We worked hard in Scotland to establish an acceptable agreement with the National Farmers Union and the Scottish Landowners Federation, and it is a matter of great disappointment to me that it was not possible to achieve a consensus view with these bodies as to how the matter should be resolved.

In these circumstances, and given the Government's commitment to provide waygoing dairy tenants with a measure of compensation in milk quota, we had to devise a statutory framework which balanced the interests concerned and which would allow the individual circumstances of each case to be taken into account. From our consultations it was clear that fairly detailed statutory guidelines were necessary to provide sufficient flexibility to take account of these individual circumstances and to ensure uniformity of approach at arbitration.

As the basic legislation governing milk quotas comprises European Community regulations, we had to be careful to avoid any undue discrimination between farmers in similar circumstances north and south of the border: a point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) on Report when we debated the provisions for England and Wales. This has led us to adopt the same general framework for Scotland as is contained in clause 11 and schedule 1.

Despite the similarities in approach, separate provision in the Bill for Scotland is required to cater for the different and more complex body of Scottish land tenure legislation and this accounts for the main differences from the provisions for England and Wales. I must apologise to the House for the fact that the complexity of Scottish land tenure legislation and the need to give due consideration to the specific circumstances of Scottish tenant dairy farmers prevented these Scottish provisions being tabled in the House concurrently with those for England and Wales.

As I said a few moments ago, the Scottish provisions are broadly comparable to those accepted for England and Wales, and as the House has already agreed to the Government's overall approach I shall spare hon. Members a detailed exposition of the Scottish provisions, but it might be helpful if I were to summarise the main elements before highlighting the differences with the provisions for England and Wales.

The majority of qualifying tenants will be those to whom the original milk quota allocations were made—producers who were occupying their holdings on 2 April 1984. These producers will normally have had primary quota allocated to them based on their production in the base year, which is "the relevant period". In most cases it is 1983. In the case of successions and assignments, compensation is not payable at the end of the original tenancy but the right is passed to the successor or assignee.

Despite the apparent complexity of the provisions the principle of the system for calculating compensation is a simply one. The actual circumstances on the tenancy at the relevant period are assessed and compared with a standard based on figures to be prescribed by the Secretary of State. If the quota allocated to the farm exceeds the "standard quota" the tenant receives the full value of the excess plus a share of the standard quota, the "tenant's fraction", based on the relative contributions made by the tenant and the landlord to the quota level achieved. Under the formula, even if the quota earned by the tenant is not greater than the standard, he will still qualify for some compensation via the tenant's fraction calculation.

2.15 am

As to the differences north and south of the border, the first and most significant is the need in Scotland to cater for four different land tenure systems and categories of tenant farmer—tenants of agricultural holdings, crofters, small landholders and statutory small tenants. Within those various systems there are differences in provision for arbitration, in certain circumstances involving the Scottish Land Court instead of, or as an alternative to, an agricultural arbiter, and in provision for succession.

The arbitration and succession provisions in the context of the amendment are also the main differences between the land tenure legislation north and south of the border. The succession provisions in particular are much more liberal in Scotland in their protection of the security of tenure enjoyed by the tenant farmer. The House may be interested to note that one result of that will be that we anticipate far fewer cases in Scotland than might be expected as a direct proportion of those likely to arise in England and Wales.

A further difference in paragraph 2(4) of the schedule is the inclusion of provision to override the schedule where a landlord and tenant agree in writing as to the amount of compensation to be paid. That reflects the situation which obtains for compensation available under existing legislation. In addition, we have made provision in paragraph 7(4)(c) of the schedule to ensure that certain private agreements between landlords and tenants in relation to waygoing compensation payable under existing legislation, which are a feature of the Scottish system, do not unfairly disadvantage the tenant in the calculation of the amount he is due in respect of quota compensation.

I refer now to the detailed operation of those arrangements in Scotland. Clearly, it is essential to ensure that recognition will be given to the particular circumstances of the Scottish dairy tenant where they differ from his counterpart south of the border. Those circumstances, such as a greater dependence on marginal land and bought-in feed, and the longer periods during which dairy cows must be kept indoors, are of greater significance in general terms in the case of dairy farmers in the original less favoured areas in Scotland and will be reflected in the standard yield per hectare figure, which will be prescribed by the Secretary of State by statutory instrument. The figure that we have in mind for the original LFAs in Scotland is 5,500 litres per hectare. That concession is particularly significant for Scottish dairy tenants since most are located in the original LFAs. The related average yield per hectare figure will be 6,200 litres. It is likely that the standard yield and average yield figures for the extended LFA and non-LFAs land in Scotland will be as for England and Wales. We also have it in mind to define different yield figures for different breeds—for example Ayrshire cows on average yield less than Friesians.

I associate myself with the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food during the debate on the previous amendment, in response to the requests by the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John).

All in all, I believe that the arrangements that we have devised for Scotland in the new clause and schedule provide a practical, balanced and fair solution to this difficult and emotive issue, which takes account not only of our complex body of existing legislation but of the practical circumstances, production patterns and farming practices of the Scottish dairy tenant.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister of State said that there had been previous consideration of compensation for waygoing dairy farm tenants in England and Wales, but that is not the case for Scotland. This is the first sight that the House of Commons has had of this fairly substantial piece of legislation. We have a new clause and a new schedule, which fill 12 pages of legislative small print, dealing with compensation to outgoing tenants of Scottish dairy farms for the value of their milk quota. Therefore, I am grateful to the Minister for going into more detail than might be normal at this time of night. Indeed, I suspect that most dairy farmers in Scotland are not thinking about getting up and milking their cows rather than finishing off the previous day's work.

Anyone who has been reading the Scottish farming press or talking to the National Farmers Union of Scotland recently will know that the matter is arousing pretty strong feelings. There is little support for the Government's proposals, although the concession that the Secretary of State appears to have obtained, affecting dairy farmers in the Scottish less-favoured areas, is welcome as far as it goes.

[Mr. Home Robertson]

This debate, in these circumstances, at this hour, is a pretty sloppy way of legislating for an important group of people. The history of this affair goes back to the memorable day in the summer of 1984 when the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was forced to accept a milk quota scheme at about two weeks' notice. At that stage he did not give the matter very much consideration, as he did not have much time to do that. He failed to comprehend the fact that he had chosen to create a new form of capital asset.

We would have preferred to avoid that pitfall by providing for the re-allocation of quota on a fairer basis than is ever likely to be achieved by buying and selling quota in a free market. That opportunity has been missed and we will have to make the best of the scheme as it is at present. We do not like the fact that the quota is now a capital commodity, but now that it is a capital commodity we are determined that tenant farmers should receive the benefit of the value of that quota where that is appropriate.

The quota market began to evolve throughout the country back in 1984, and nothing was done to protect tenants' rights. The Bill was introduced in November 1985, but nothing was done for the tenants. Nothing was done for them during the Committee stage, but on Report a dog's breakfast in relation to England and Wales was produced and at the last gasp we have a modified dog's breakfast in relation to Scottish farm tenants.

The Lords completed consideration of the Bill last night, so the first official knowledge that we had of the new clause and the schedule came this morning. That presents us with certain difficulties. We do not like the package, and Scottish farmers are not very keen on it. On 11 June the Scottish National Farmers Union wrote to Members of the House of Lords urging them

"to reject the Government's recommendations and to call for their replacement by a simpler, more objective and commercial approach."

The difficulty that we face tonight is that that is all that there appears to be on offer. Any delay might prevent some tenants from receiving even this limited compensation for the three months of the summer recess.

The package is unbelievably complicated and there must obviously be simpler ways of achieving a fairer solution. We have standard quotas, tenant's fractions and relevant periods, all leading to evaluation and a settlement at the end of the lease provided that the tenant or his heir remembers to lodge his written notice within two months in order to beat a potentially very difficult time bar under paragraph 11. We have been advised by people who understand these matters that the formula is likely to mean that the most that any tenant can hope to obtain is about 70 per cent. of the value of his quota, unless we can get further guidance for arbiters and the Land Court on the lines suggested by the Minister of State.

We have been trying to encourage the Minister and the Government, by various means, to ensure that tenants can get the full value of their quota where such compensation is justified. I understood the Minister of State to say that he was giving the same undertaking as his right hon. Friend gave some moments ago. This is important. There are tenanted dairy farms in Scotland where the tenant has made more than the normal tenant's contribution towards the value of the dairy unit. In addition to his contribution towards the dairy herd, his husbandry, management and machinery, he may also have invested heavily in the buildings and fixed equipment in the dairy enterprise. He may indeed have been entirely responsible for establishing the dairy unit.

In these circumstances, there can be no justification for giving a landlord, who may have contributed nothing towards the value of the quota, a windfall of 30 per cent. of the value of that quota. Paragraph 6(2) refers to certain physical factors to be taken into account in calculating the standard quota—the land, the climate and the average yield.

The full proportion of the tenant's investment in the value of the quota should also be considered. If he has contributed 100 per cent., he should be eligible to receive 100 per cent. in compensation for his investment under such circumstances.

The Government have a bit of a nerve to ask the House to deal with a matter of this nature as a Lords amendment at 24 hours' notice. We will probably not be too keen on facilitating the passage of the Bill this week unless we are given an assurance that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that tenants can be compensated in full.

I ask the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland to confirm that it is his intention that to ensure that arbiters and the Scottish Land Court will take into account a tenant's investment and contributions, and that there need be no ceiling on the proportion of the value of quota that will be subject to compensation at a tenant's waygoing.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I agree with the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) that it is unfortunate that the consideration of the Scottish part of the Bill must start with this important passage at 2.30 am, but I agree with my right hon. and hon. Friends that the Bill must pass into law as soon as possible. Therefore, we must accept the position. The matter is highly contentious, and I appreciate that Ministers in England and in Scotlad have consulted in great depth the National Farmers Union and the Scottish Landowners Federation, but have not, sadly, brought both together in a common solution, much as we would have wished them to do so.

To put the matter in context, we must accept that only a remarkably small number of tenant dairy farmers give up their business each year — perhaps 10 a year in Scotland, only half of whom will be the special cases mentioned by the hon. Member for East Lothian. I am glad to note that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland managed to achieve less-favoured area weighting in Scotland, which will be of great benefit.

The issue started in April 1984, when there were no quotas and, therefore, no right to compensation for a tenant farmer giving up his lease. He would have had to depart under the normal outgoing settlement made by an arbiter. But quotas were created in April 1984, under the jurisdiction of the EEC, and at the same time we created a new asset and a windfall for tenant farmers, although I appreciate that they have gone through a difficult period in mastering the quota system.

We must put on record, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins), the fact that whatever we do tonight will make it much more difficult for new entrants into dairy farming to obtain leases and to pay the large sum that will be necessary to gain occupation.

I agree with most farmers that it is difficult to understand why the legislation must be so complex. Why cannot we have a normal waygoing, with valuation by an arbiter, who is highly skilled and highly qualified? He would take into account everything that is covered by the lease, and the landlord and tenant would accept his decision. I realise that these are special cases, but they are not too far away from a parallel with the hill sheep farmer on waygoing, where the sheep stock is bound to the ground and must be taken over after arbitration. I do not understand why we do not have something similar for milk quotas.

If it is impossible to introduce such an amendment—at this stage it is impossible—I hope that my hon. Friend will be as flexible as possible when he drafts the statutory instruments. This is a highly complicated matter, which few farmers will be able to understand, and which has failed to satisfy the NFU and the Scottish Landowners Federation. The statutory instruments, which of course will be debated in due course, must be carefully drafted.

I was not too happy about the English amendment, but I am much more happy about the Scottish one, provided that we can introduce greater flexibility, especially in regard to paragraph 6(2) of the proposed schedule. We must consider the quality of the land. Part of the formula means multiplying hectares by the standard yield. The production from a hectare of less-favoured area land or of low-quality land will be much lower than from high-quality land.

We must also consider the possibility of the tenant putting in a great deal of equipment—perhaps all of it—but still being eligible for only 70 per cent. of the arbitration. In exceptional circumstances, the tenant should be able to obtain more than 70 per cent. I hope that the statutory instrument will allow that.

I agree with the hon. Member for East Lothian that the tenant's fraction is difficult. This will be new ground for the arbiter and the Scottish Land Court. There is no history of dealing with tenants' improvements relative to annual rental value, and guidance to all concerned will be very important.

2.30 am

The structure of land tenure in Scotland is important, and we must try to retain harmony between landlord and tenant if we are to develop the rural community as we want. I beg my hon. Friend the Minister to bear what I have said in mind when formulating the statutory instrument. We must make the legislation much more simple and understandable for the average farmer, and give good guidelines to the arbiters who are to implement it.

Mr. Maclennan: I must express my censure of the Government for bringing forward this new clause at this stage of the Bill's passage through Parliament. It is impossible to do justice to important legislation such as this while having to compress Second Reading, Committee stage, Report and Third Reading into this short debate. This issue is central to the prosperity of the tenanted and landowning sector.

I acknowledge that the Government had the perfectly worthy objective of trying to obtain the agreement of all those affected, but it became clear quite early on that such agreement would not be forthcoming. The Government are charged with the task of making decisions and recommending them to the House in such circumstances. The consequence of their delay is that the House has not been able to give its opinion of what would be the equitable solution. It is quite clear that the solution that the Government have advanced is not regarded as equitable by most of those who are principally engaged in dairy farming. It has been made quite clear by the National Farmers Union of Scotland, and it was repeated at a council meeting as recently as 9 July, that it regards the clause as most unsatisfactory and tilted in favour of the landowner, which is not entirely surprising.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): It would.

Mr. Maclennan: It would, naturally, because it is coming to realise that the Government are not all that interested in tenant farmers.

I do not propose to go over the ground that has been admirably covered by the hon. Members for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), but will the Minister take this opportunity to go further than the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food did earlier about what the Government mean by the statement that an arbiter may allow a tenant the full value of his improvements in making the decision on compensation?

The Minister of State seemed to set at naught the provisions of the schedule, which are certainly complicated and hard to understand. I do not pretend to have been able wholly to follow the precise mathematical calculations. Even the most cursory examination of them suggests that the arbiters must follow these formulae in reaching their decisions and that they do not have discretion in the matter. If the Minister is saying that arbiters have discretion, like the hon. Member for Dumfries, I cannot see why it is necessary to insert all these complicated formulae in the schedule. This seems to fetter the discretion of the arbiters, not to give them the capacity to make an award to a tenant of 100 per cent. if that is thought appropriate. It is almost inconceivable that 100 per cent. would be appropriate, but a percentage considerably higher than the 70 per cent., which the National Farmers Union of Scotland perceives to be the maximum likely under the schedule's provisions could be appropriate.

It will assist the comprehension of the Scottish farming industry if the Minister can say whether this complex, 12-page provision, setting out the formula which the arbiters must apply, can be modified by the exercise of their judgment and discretion. If so, there will be general relief. We shall remain puzzled by the mysteries of draftsmanship which require this complex provision, but comforted in the knowledge that arbiters may be guided, but not bound, by it. I hope that the Minister can explain that mystery.

This is exactly the sort of matter that we would wish to probe in Committee. It is most unsatisfactory that we can have only one bite of the cherry and cannot come back to probe if the Minister's explanation is unclear. I regret that, and it is a mistake that flows from the Government's initial error of being unprepared to introduce quotas and of having quotas thrust on them without any preliminary thinking about how they would be applied. The Government had been warned by me on many occasions — the Minister knows that perfectly well — that this would be discussed and was an important possibility. The Government's answer throughout was that they were not thinking of and were not in favour of, quotas. Therefore, no preliminary work was done, which is why we are in this mess today. I hope that the Minister will answer that simple point which is troubling many farmers in Scotland.

[Mr. Maclennan]

Sir Paul Hawkins: Although I know nothing about the law of Scotland or the valuation of Scottish holdings, I ask a question and I hope that it will be answered. I believe that, in any valuation, discretion must be left to the valuer or arbiter. I hope that that will be the case. Sometimes we talk about the full value being paid in exceptional circumstances. If a tenant has put far too expensive and elaborate equipment on to a holding, he should not be paid the full cost of that. Those points should be made clear for the benefit of any future valuer or arbiter.

Mr. John MacKay: Arbiters are skilled in such matters. They take all the things that they see and that are put to them into account when they reach their conclusions and decisions. I am certain that the arbiter will be well able to make the kinds of judgments that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) mentioned.

The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) rightly recognises that any delay could prevent some tenants from receiving compensation. I appreciate that he accepts that we must move on, so that a tenant moving out of his tenancy will be in a position to get some compensation for his quota.

We shall be giving guidance to the arbiters. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) that when we draw up the statutory instruments we shall take great care to do that in as simple a way as possible. However, I think that the definition of the word "simple" may vary from one person to another.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) and others raised the perception — I think that the hon. Gentleman expressed it in that way — of the National Farmers Union. It was precisely because of that perception that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made a statement earlier this evening. I echo what he said in conclusion. He said:

"I hope this will provide reassurance that the Bill leaves arbitrators free to give full credit to the tenant who has effectively done everything except provide the land."

Even in the best case of a tenant's investment, the landlord makes a contribution of the land. That must be reflected in the apportionment. A 100 per cent. share for the tenant would not be conceivable. I believe that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland conceded that point. With those few remarks, I hope that the House will agree to the Lords amendment.

New Clause

RENT ARBITRATIONS: MILK QUOTAS, SCOTLAND

Lords amendment: No. 11, after clause 11, insert the following new clause—

". — (1) Paragraph 1 and the other provisions of Schedule (Scotland: Tenant's compensation for milk quota) to this Act referred to therein shall have effect for the interpretation of this section, as they do in relation to that Schedule.

(2) This section applies where an arbiter or the Scottish Land Court is dealing with a reference under—

(a) section 6 of the 1886 Act;

(b) section 32(7) of the 1911 Act;

(c) section 7 of the 1949 Act; or

(d) section 5(3) of the 1955 Act,

(determination of rent) and the tenant has milk quota, including transferred quota by virtue of a transaction the cost of which was borne wholly or partly by him, registered as his in relation to a holding consisting of or including the tenancy.

(3) Where this section applies, the arbiter or, as the case may be, the Land Court shall disregard any increase in the rental value of the tenancy which is due to—

(a) where the tenancy comprises the holding, the proportion of the transferred quota which reflects the proportion of the cost of the transaction borne by the tenant;

(b) where such transferred quota affects part only of the tenancy, that proportion of so much of the transferred quota as would fall to be apportioned to the tenancy under the 1986 Regulations on a change of occupation of the tenancy.

(4) For the purposes of determining whether transferred quota has been acquired by virtue of a transaction the cost of which was borne wholly or partly by the tenant any payment by a tenant when he was granted a lease, or when a lease was assigned to him, shall be disregarded.

(5) Paragraph 3 of Schedule (Scotland: Tenant's compensation for milk quota) to this Act (insofar as it relates to transferred quota) shall apply in relation to the operation of this section as it applies in relation to the operation of that Schedule.

(6) This section shall apply where paragraph 4 of Schedule (Scotland: Tenant's compensation for milk quota) to this Act applies, and in any question between the original landlord and the head tenant, this section shall apply as if any transferred quota acquired by the sub-tenant by virtue of any transaction during the subsistence of the sub-lease had been acquired by the head tenant by virtue of that transaction.

(7) Section 86 of the 1949 Act (Crown land) shall have effect in relation to this section as it does in relation to that Act."

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This amendment parallels for Scotland amendments Nos. 8 and 10 regarding England and Wales.

Clause 13

DESIGNATION AND MANAGEMENT OF ENVIRONMENTALLY SENSITIVE AREAS

Lords amendment: No. 13, in page 10, line 33, after "may" insert

"with the consent of the Treasury and after consulting the persons mentioned in subsection (3) below as to the inclusion of the area in the order and the features for which conservation, enhancement or protection is desirable".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 14, in page 10, line 35, leave out subsection (2).

No. 15, in page 11, line 1, leave out "(2)" and insert "(1)".

No. 16, in page 11, line 35, leave out "are" and insert "is".

No. 17, in page 11, line 36, at end insert—

"(6A) The Minister shall not make an agreement with any person under subsection (4) above in respect of any land unless that person has certified to the Minister—

(a) that no person other than he is the owner of the land; or

(b) that he has notified any other person who is an owner of the land of his intention to make an agreement under subsection (4) above in respect of the land; and in this subsection references to the owner of the land are to the estate owner in respect of the fee simple in the land or, in Scotland, the absolute owner of the land within the meaning of section 93 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act 1949."

No. 18, in page 11, line 38, leave out "as respects any land" and insert

"with any person interested in any land in England or Wales"

No. 19, in page 11, line 39, leave out from "title" to "and" in line 40 and insert

"under or from that person"

No. 20, in page 11, line 41 at end insert—

"(7A) Where agreements have been made under subsection (4) above with persons having an interest in land in a designated area the Minister shall arrange for the effect on the area as a whole of the performance of the agreements to be kept under review and shall from time to time publish such information as he considers appropriate about those effects.".

No. 21, after clause 13, insert the following new clause—

Supplementary provisions regarding agreements under section 13(4) in Scotland

"—(1) Where a person having an interest of a kind described in section 13(4) above in land in Scotland, being an interest which enables him to bind the land, enters into an agreement under that subsection—

(a) where the land is registered in the Land Register of Scotland, the agreement may be registered in that Register;

(b) in any other case the agreement may be recorded in the appropriate Division of the General Register of Sasines.

(2) An agreement registered or recorded under subsection (1) above shall be enforceable at the instance of the Secretary of State against persons deriving title to the land (including any person acquiring right to a tenancy by assignation or succession) from the person who entered into the agreement; provided that such an agreement shall not be enforceable against a third party who shall have in good faith and for value acquired right (whether completed by infeftment or not) to the land prior to the agreement being registered or recorded as aforesaid, or against any person deriving title from such third party.

(3) Notwithstanding the terms of any agreement registered or recorded under subsection (1) above, the parties to the agreement or any persons deriving title from them may at any time agree to terminate it; and such an agreement to terminate it shall be registered or recorded in the same manner as was the original agreement.

(4) A grazings committee appointed under section 24 of the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1955 may, with the consent of a majority of the crofters ordinarily resident in the township, enter into an agreement under section 13(4) above in relation to any part of the common grazings and may agree to the revocation or variation of any such agreement, and such agreement, revocation or variation shall be binding upon all their successors.

(5) In the case of an agreement of a kind referred to in subsection (4) above, the payments by the Secretary of State shall be made to the grazings committee and shall be applied by them either—

(a) by division among the crofters who share in the common grazings in proportion to their respective rights therein; or

(b) subject to subsection (6) below, in carrying out works for the improvement of the common grazings or the fixed equipment required in connection therewith.

(6) A grazings committee to whom such a payment as is referred to in subsection (5) above has been made and who are proposing to apply the payment in carrying out works in accordance with paragraph (b) of that subsection shall give notice in writing to each crofter sharing in the common grazings of their proposals: and any such crofter may within one month of the date of such notice make representations in respect of the proposals to the Crofters Commission who may approve them with or without modifications or reject them.

(7) "Crofter" and other expressions used in any of subsections (4) to (6) above and in section 3 of the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1955 have the same meaning in this section as they have in that section as read with section 15(6) of the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1961.".

Mr. Gummer: Amendments Nos. 16, 18, 19 and 21 are technical in nature. During our earlier debate on environmentally sensitive areas, I gave various commitments to the House. Those commitments have been built into the clause. Amendments Nos. 13, 14 and 15 seek to allay fears that the Treasury would have a power of veto over the designation of ESAs. We had a merry debate about that. We heard a great deal of the abilities or, very often, the disabilities of Treasury Ministers to make such judgments. However I tried to explain that that was the phrase always used, it struck an evil note, and I was concerned that this series of propositions, which has been so widely welcomed, should not be soured in that way.

I must be perfectly frank and say that the amendments do not materially alter the arrangements for consultation with the Treasury. They more positively and accurately reflect the extent of the Treasury's role. It is clear that the Treasury is concerned with the financial provision, not with vetoing the environmental case for any particular area. I hope that this will set at rest minds which had been considerably stirred on this matter.

2.45 am

Amendment No. 17 places a duty on the Minister not to enter into an environmentally sensitive area agreement with someone other than the owner of the land, unless that owner has been notified. We agreed that we would do that, but it seemed sensible to have statutory backing.

I turn to amendment No. 20. It is important that the Government and the public know how ESAs are working. In the discussions on the Bill, I made a point of saying how important it was that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should be involved in the direction of ESAs and that this should not be farmed out to anyone else. We wanted those concerned to learn from experience particular conservation needs because that would in some way counter the belief still held in some quarters that the Ministry did not have that kind of practical day-to-day experience. This emphasises the Government's commitment to effective implementation of ESAs. We have made provision for reports to be published on how the scheme operates. I am sure that they will be reviewed with great interest.

Once the Bill receives the Royal Assent, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on a list of ESAs, as the Bill requires. That cannot be done until the Bill is passed. We plan to announce our decision on this as early as possible, but it will be obvious that that cannot be before the House rises. It is obviously important that the announcement should be made, and we shall try to make it relatively soon after the House rises.

In the circumstances, I hope that the alterations, all of which move in the direction of helping those hon. Members with fears about the presentation of the provisions, will enable this clause, of all clauses, to go forward with the united support of all who want greater concern shown for the environment.

Mr. John: I thank the Minister especially for the monitoring provision. It is a welcome advance. The right hon. Gentleman wants to set our minds at rest. I think we all want to do that at about a quarter to three in the morning. Although in presentation the Treasury's role is much diminished, in practice I fear that it will be as baneful as ever. I am not totally reassured on that point.

I thank the Minister for stating his intention to issue the list of ESAs. I should like to press him on some further points. We shall go into the programme of drawing up the detailed management scheme in consultation with the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council. How long does the Minister expect the process to take? On 12 June, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, answering my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), said that he expected the first payments under the scheme to be made in 1987, with the date being somewhat imprecise. Can the right hon. Gentleman now announce a more specific time?

What sort of payments will be made? Will they be made on the single flat-rate basis, or will there be different grants for different environmental purposes? Will the Minister be more explicit than the Parliamentary Secretary, whose absence we regret, on 8 July when we were discussing agriculture structures? The hon. Lady was pressed by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) as to whether the additional £1·5 million available for ESAs, which was likely to come from the Commission, was going to be new money to be added to the £6 million already committed to ESAs in this country or whether it was going to be used by the same baneful Treasury as a sort of contribution towards reducing its net expenditure. We very much want the £1·5 million to be added to the £6 million already committed, which is little enough. I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm that.

Mr. Livsey: We welcome wholeheartedly the establishment of ESAs. The element of voluntary accession by farmers and the payments concerned are extremely helpful. However, I would like to back up what the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) has ssid. We would like more information about the type of payments to be made and whether they will follow the pattern that has occurred in Norfolk, for example, and what alternatives to them will be forthcoming.

We hope that there will be sufficient ADAS staff to administer the payments after what has happened in clause 1 of the Bill. It is all very well to say that they will be trained, but will they be there in sufficient numbers to carry out the job?

In part of the Bill referring to national parks — although it impinges on ESAs — we are concerned in Wales about the vetting of capital grants and whether there are implications for the expansion of farming enterprises with those grants. We fear that there will be a regression by those vetting the grants so that farmers will not have the opportunity to expand their businesses in the way that they might be able to do outside national parks. That is of considerable concern in some of the national park areas.

Mr. Maclennan: My questions arise on amendment No. 21 which relates to Scotland and deals with the entitlements of those who acquire land on which an agreement has been entered by the original owner. First, is it the Government's intention that all agreements should be registered with the Land Register, or the appropriate division of the General Register of Sasines, before they enter into a final commitment? Amendment No. 21 appears to provide that someone who has acquired title to land which is unregistered shall not be deemed to be bound by the agreement without notice. That might defeat the purpose of the agreement and of the Government's policy underlying it. I hope that the Minister may feel able to say something about whether it is felt appropriate, when entering into an agreement, to seek to obtain the assurance of the farmer that it will be registered. It would seem desirable to put subsequent tenants of the land on notice in that way.

My second point relates to crofting. There is a certain obscurity in the language. This is really a Committee point, but, unfortunately, we are not having a Committee stage on this amendment. Under the provisions of the proposed subsection (3) of the new clause contained in amendment No. 21.

"parties to the agreement . . . may at any time agree to terminate it".

That does not appear to be the case with respect to crofters who, according to the proposed subsection (4), are subject to the provision that "such agreement . . . shall be binding upon all their successors."

That is, to the successors of the grazings committee.

I may have misunderstood this point. It looks as though it is an agreement that operates in perpetuity for crofters, but not in respect of other parties. This point may be difficult for the Minister to answer, and in any event the amendment is not capable of being changed. I should be satisfied if the Minister would prefer to write to me about it.

Mr. Gummer: With the leave of the House. I cannot claim to be expert enough about the crofters to give the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) exactly the answer that he would like, but my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland has said that he will write to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Registration depends on the agreement, because some agreements, for example to build a wall, do not need to be registered. Others, of a longer-lasting kind, may be registered, as the Bill makes clear. I assure the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) that I am wary about talking about EEC funding only because we are discussing a proposal that has not yet got to a final state. I took part, as he will imagine, given the circumstances of the presidency, in detailed discussion on this, and I do not yet want to say anything about it.

I shall be looking at the matter carefully, because the EEC proposals sometimes mean that they cannot be used in the same way as the present structure of the ESAs. As we are taking the lead on this — my right hon. Friend the Minister first pressed it on the Commission — we have implemented it early. We shall want to watch this carefully, and I do not see that it has a direct bearing on what we propose to do.

I cannot continue to go into more detailed discussion on the type of payments, because we have sought in our discussions so far, although they are not complete, to look at the various areas that we might choose for this in an effort to pick areas that offer a wide range of experience. We discussed this in Committee, and both sides were agreed. As that is the case, I can envisage that the types of payment would not always be the same. We see this as experimental, and that point has been generally accepted.

Consultations with the NCC and the Countryside Commission, and the consequential timing of introducing ESA arrangements have already taken place, and we hope that it may be possible to introduce the arrangements early in 1987. Our aim is to get this under way as rapidly as possible because that would be the wish of the House. I shall not give any particular month, but we are doing this as rapidly as possible.

We have sufficient ADAS staff. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) keeps suggesting that we do not. He is as wrong on this — this is an uncontroversial statement — as he is on so many other things. I confirm entirely the assurances given in another place on this. It is important that it is realised that we put high priority on what we are trying to do here, and I am sure that that is in accordance with what the House would like.

The only other point of consequence that should be answered is that in dealing with these environmentally sensitive areas, we have to ensure that everybody can learn what is going on. That is why the reporting arrangements are being put into the Bill, and why I am pleased about the welcome given by the hon. Member for Pontypridd. The more we know about the success or failure of particular parts of it, the more we shall be able to learn about the future. This is the beginning, rather than the end, of the process.

New Clause

FARM CAPITAL GRANTS: ANCILLARY BUSINESSES ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 23, after clause 14, insert the following new clause—

> (1) In section 28 of the Agriculture Act 1970 (interpretation of provisions relating to capital and other grants) at the end of the definition of "agricultural business" there shall be inserted the words "and includes any other business, of a kind for the time being specified by an order made by the appropriate authority, which is carried on by a person also carrying on a business consisting in or partly in the pursuit of agriculture and is carried on on the same or adjacent land".
> (2) The existing provisions of that section shall become subsection (1) of that section and after that subsection there shall be inserted—
> "(2) An order under subsection (1) above shall be made by statutory instrument and any statutory instrument containing such an order shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.".".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment extends Minister's power over agriculture capital grants to cover ancillary farm-based businesses. We discussed this in Committee, and listened carefully to what was said. I gave an assurance that I would look to see whether there was a way in which we could put forward what was necessary. My hon. Friend who pressed this amendment on us was very concerned that we should be able to take account of the changing circumstances for agriculture and the urgent need to find alternatives for farmers whose products are in surplus. Farm diversification is one of the most promising of these avenues.

3 am

Therefore, the Government have listened very sympathetically to the proposition that the Agriculture Ministers should give financial aid to help farmers to develop other enterprises on their farms. The wide support that this idea has attracted in both Houses of Parliament has encouraged us in the belief that now is the appropriate time for the Ministry to take the necessary powers. Accordingly, this amendment would permit agriculture Ministers to make grants to ancillary businesses specified by order, provided that the person carrying on the business has a farm on the same or adjacent land.

I should, however, warn hon. Members that at this stage we are taking only an enabling power. Before any schemes could be introduced under it, they would need to be cleared with the European Commission as state aids. Also, we have still to resolve the question of how the new schemes might be funded. Nevertheless, to miss this opportunity of enabling the Ministry to take these measures would be quite wrong. This is a good opportunity to ensure that the Ministry's powers cover what is a much more appropriate definition of agriculture.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to inform the House that this amendment involves privilege.

Mr. John: I extend a welcome to the principle. In Committee many hon. Members felt that this would be a worthwhile extension of the Ministry's powers. I am glad that candidly, but in rather less lurid language than that used by the Ministry spokesman in Big Farm Weekly, the Minister has announced that, although the principle has been accepted, it does not mean that any cash will be forthcoming. The Ministry spokesman said that the Ministry had taken on board exciting new powers but that it was not saying that it would provide any new cash. It is the prospect of new cash and of translating the principle into actuality that interests us.

When, therefore, may we expect such grants to be introduced? When will an approach be made to the European Commission? And what sorts of grants will be on offer? If the Minister could provide a realistic assessment of what he believes will happen, it would add realism to what is regarded as a heady concept by the Ministry. However, without money it will remain a matter of principle.

Mr. Cash: I welcome this provision. I have sought in various ways to secure the creation of a provision of this kind, and I am delighted that it has been introduced. However, I hope that it will not be too restrictively construed and that it will not be confined to questions relating to agriculture and agricultural land. The object of the exercise is to enable farmers to sustain their incomes by going in for other small business activities — for example, bed and breakfast.

When these grants are made available, will people be able to use the land in the way for which the money is provided? This question relates to the White Paper "Food from Our Own Resources" that was published in 1975 and the guidelines that followed from it.

I hope that some steps can be taken to ensure that maximum flexibility is built into the planning process so that when grants and/or advice under clause 1 are made available, it will be open to the farmers affected — in order to sustain their incomes at a time of over-production and when they are having considerable pressure put upon them — to go into other businesses. I hope that the planning process can be eased to that end.

Mr. Maclennan: The Government's decision to take the power to make farm capital grants available for ancillary businesses is entirely welcome. I was rather disappointed that the Minister hedged it round with caveats about having to go to the European Community to clear these proposals for state aid before he was prepared to state the Government's intention. It is clear that certain aids of this kind would conform completely to European Community legislation.

The integrated development programme for the Western Isles involves grants to non-agricultural enterprises and I understand that that is done on regional grounds. I recognise that this power goes beyond that and more towards the guidance part of the farm fund. Is it the Minister's intention to pursue this quickly with the Commission to make sure that there is no obstacle in the way of diversification out of normal farming activity and into other businesses that can be carried on from a farm? It would be acceptable if he could give us an idea of his sense of urgency.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that the Minister has the leave of the House to speak again.

Mr. Gummer: I want to be frank about the points that have been raised; to do that one has to look at the matter in the following sequence. First, the Bill gives us an opportunity to take powers. That opportunity will not arise again in the near future and for that reason it seemed necessary to make a clear decision in principle. Secondly, anybody who has been involved in Government will know perfectly well that such powers are not taken unless there is the intention to use them.

I think the word "baleful" was used in describing the eye of the Treasury, but naturally the Treasury would not wish powers with implied use to be taken when it would not allow them to be used. There is a stage before one goes to the European Commission and it is to look much more closely at the kind of scheme that might be available, and not only at schemes which would work and which would meet the requirements, but also at schemes that would be acceptable to the Commission and to the Community.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) was right to say that there ought to be nothing in this Bill contrary to the intentions of the Community. However, these things are often seen as national aids. They can be misused and the Community rightly keeps a close eye on them. We are keen that it should do so because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, one of the problems in the industry is the feeling by our farmers that farmers elsewhere are aided in ways that are not open to them. If we press other Governments to be as careful as we wish them to be, and if we demand that their proposals are properly scrutinised, we must do those things ourselves. These matters must be looked at carefully and after that we will go to the Commission when we decide that we have something that we ought to present. Then we will have to resolve how such schemes should be funded.

I hope that the House will accept that this Bill is an earnest of our intentions. First, we will look at agriculture in the wider sense presaged by the change in the definition of agriculture contained in the Bill. That is probably the most important thing in the Bill, because it says that agriculture is different to the very narrow view of it which was to be found in the Acts under which we worked in the past.

In future, people will look back at the Act and see it as beginning a new era in agriculture. The major difference will be the definition of agriculture. The House should be grateful, not only to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) but also to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) who has fought the battle through and pushed it in Committee and explained it in a way that has enable us to take this step.

The planning aspect is overwhelmingly a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. However, there is every intention, as has been outlined particularly in the White Paper "Lifting the Burden", to be much more flexible in the way in which we deal with planning. But even then we have to accept that there is a real responsibility to ensure that the planning laws are so enforced that we get flexibility for new jobs and enterprises without destroying the very environment which makes those jobs and enterprises possible. It is a balance. It is not easy and it is one which we should take seriously, because the countryside is also a place of refreshment for those who live in the towns.

Schedule 1

Tenants' Compensation for Milk Quota

Lords amendment: No. 38, in page 19, line 2, leave out paragraph 6 and insert—

"6.—(1) Subject to the following provisions of this paragraph the standard quota for any land for the purposes of this Schedule shall be calculated by multiplying the relevant number of hectares by the prescribed quota per hectare; and for the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) "the relevant number of hectares" means the average number of hectares of the land in question used during the relevant period for the feeding of dairy cows kept on the land or, if different, the average number of hectares of the land which could reasonably be expected to have been so used (having regard to the number of grazing animals other than dairy cows kept on the land during that period; and

(b) "the prescribed quota per hectare" means such number of litres as the Minister may from time to time by order prescribe for the purposes of this sub-paragraph.

(2) Where by virtue of the quality of the land in question or climatic conditions in the area the amount of milk which could reasonably be expected to have been produced from one hectare of the land during the relevant period ("the reasonable amount") is greater or less than the prescribed average yield per hectare, then sub-paragraph (1) above shall not apply and the standard quota shall be calculated by multiplying the relevant number of hectares by such proportion of the prescribed quota per hectare as the reasonable amount bears to the prescribed average yield per hectare; and the Minister shall by order prescribe the amount of milk to be taken as the average yield per hectare for the purposes of this sub-paragraph.

(3) Where the relevant quota of the land includes milk quota allocated in pursuance of an award of quota made by the Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for England and Wales which has not been allocated in full, the standard quota for the land shall be reduced by the amount by which the milk quota allocated in pursuance of the award falls short of the amount awarded (or, in a case where only part of the milk quota allocated in pursuance of the award is included in the relevant quota, by the corresponding proportion of that shortfall).

(4) In sub-paragraph (3) above the references to milk quota allocated in pursuance of an award of quota include references to quota allocated by virtue of the amount awarded not originally having been allocated in full.

(5) In this paragraph—

(a) references to land used for the feeding of dairy cows kept on the land do not include land used for growing cereal crops for feeding to dairy cows in the form of loose grain; and

(b) references to dairy cows are to cows kept for milk production (other than uncalved heifers).

(6) An order under this paragraph may make different provision for different cases.

(7) The power to make an order under this paragraph shall be exercisable by statutory instrument and any instrument containing such an order shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.".

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 39, in page 20, line 9, leave out

"in connection with the production of cow's milk"

and insert

"for the feeding, accommodation or milking of dairy cows kept on the land".

No. 40, in page 20, line 17, leave out from "improvements" to end of line 18 and insert

"to, or tenant's fixed equipment on, land used for the feeding, accommodation or milking of dairy cows kept on the land in question".

No. 48, in page 25, line 47, at end insert—

"(1A) In this Schedule references to land used for the feeding of dairy cows kept on the land and to dairy cows have the same meaning as in paragraph 6 above.".

Mr. Gummer: The House will want to pay a little attention to this group of amendments. Hon. Members may recall from discussions on 17 April that the level of standard quota is at the heart of the calculation of compensation which may be payable.

There are those who have produced all sorts of ways of trying to make a fair arrangement between landlord and tenant, between outgoer and incomer, but we have tried to find the fairest method. In doing so we discussed a number of disadvantages and I assured the House that I would seek to meet some of the concerns which existed.

One of my hon. Friends was concerned to suggest that in marginal land, particularly in his county, the arrangements might not be satisfactory for tenant farmers. So we have tried to meet some of those considerations. Not least, we have removed the 20 per cent. restriction on variations in the standard quota about which so much concern was expressed, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), who is not here this evening only because of his illness. He would want me to say that he is pleased with the changes.

My hon. Friend has an eagle eye, so I know that the House will appreciate his view. He has pointed out that we have tried to meet the issues that he raised. For practical reasons, we have concluded that the area of land to be taken into account in the calculation of both the standard quota and the tenant's fraction will be limited to the land used by dairy cows alone, excluding the land used by followers. The calculation of the standard quota should therefore reflect the yield achievable on that basis.

3.15 am

Similarly, when it comes to the tenant's fraction calculation, the tenant's share would be assessed on the basis of the improvements that he has made that relate to the dairy cows. The landlord's share would be based on the rent paid for the land used by the dairy cows. Followers will be excluded from the calculations at all stages.

Hon. Members will note that there is a change to the definition of dairy cows. In case any hon. Member is worried about that, I had better make it clear that it is not merely that they are not bulls. The new definition is purely intended to improve the clarity of drafting. It takes account of the dictionary definition of a cow as any female bovine animal. We want to make it clear that uncalved heifers are not included. Although the reason for that involves a tiny detail, it means that the tenant is not disadvantaged, which might happen, by a distortion in the calculations.

As I have said, we have removed the 20 per cent. restriction on variations in standard quota. We have already announced that, in setting the figures in this subordinate legislation for the prescribed quota and the prescribed average yield per hectare, we intend to use 8,000 and 9,000 litres respectively. The difference between those two figures reflects the cut in production following the introduction of quotas. It means that the prescribed quota figure will normally be some 11 per cent. below the yield that would be reasonable for the holding, having regard to the quality of the land and the climatic conditions.

We have also announced that we intend to set lower figures for the less favoured areas. Here we intend to prescribe quota per hectare of 7,000 litres for disadvantaged land and 6,000 litres for severely disadvantaged land. Concern has also been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House on two other points. First, it was argued that tenants who had received an award of development quota should not be penalised simply because that award had not been allocated in full. Secondly, there was concern that tenant's compensation should not be reduced as a result of any future general cuts in quota. Both those points are covered by the amendments.

Amendment No. 48 extends the definition of "land used for the feeding of dairy cows kept on the land" and the definition of "dairy cows" contained in the new paragraph 6, so that they apply to paragraph 7 of schedule 1 as well. As I have said, the intention is that in the calculation of the standard quota and the tenant's fraction, land used by followers should be excluded. The purpose of the amendments is to meet many of the concerns that have been expressed.

I hope that the House will accept that, even though we have been unable to go as far as some wanted us to go, we have corrected those things that people thought might create a distortion in the equity that we sought to achieve. I remind that House that every penny paid to the outgoer is in the end paid by the incomer. There is a balance to be struck between those two sides. Hon. Members have suggested that tenants are somehow being done down, but both incoming and outgoing tenants are affected by what happens to others. If we want young people coming into our dairy industry, we must not set the price of entry too high, as that would gravely damage the landlord-tenant system.

In sorting out some of the anomalies that might otherwise arise, I believe that it would have been wrong for us to go any further towards making it expensive to go into dairying. That would have done something that this Government have always set their face against. It would have increased the difficulties for those entering farming, thus making it a much more enclosed and separate part of the economy. None of us wants that.

Mr. John: There is a simple answer to the agonising of the Minister of State and the hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins). It is the creation, quite uncovenanted, of a capital asset out of a milk quota that is causing tension between the incoming and outgoing tenant, and I think that on reflection it will be acepted that that should never have been allowed to happen. I do not think that any of us anticipated the result.

As the milk quota is, in theory, a temporary phenomenon that is to be reviwed in 1989, a Labour Government would undertake to review whether the capital trading in milk quotas should continue. A surrender and redistribution of the quota to where it would be most needed, and where it would do most good, would be a far better concept for the incoming tenant as well as for the outgoing one. Compensation is called for by the initial mistake, and it is the Government who made the mistake. It is they who have created the capital asset.

Having made those comments in the same non-controversial manner as the Minister of State adopted, I accept that this is a series of amendments which slightly assist the tenant farmer, and for that reason we would not dream of opposing them, but it is not only the NFU and the Scottish NFU which have said that the Government take too rosy a picture of the tenant's share. The examples that have been given do not match some of the percentage predictions. On 27 June Farming News described Lord Belstead's conclusion and produced some figures which showed that his figure of £19,000 was only a quarter share of the total compensation payable in his example.

We are talking about an average share for tenant dairy farmers of 30 per cent. of the quota value, which I do not think is fair or just. As the Ministry's own research booklet observes, the stocking rate per hectare for cows means that if the grass is left without treatment—it is the tenant who treats the grass with nitrogen—the cows will not provide any milk and they will be only partly maintained. That is the real argument in favour of the tenant having a much larger share of the value of the quota, and the Opposition believe that that share should have been achieved.

Mr. Livsey: The guts of the compensation arrangement for tenant farmers in respect of milk quotas will come in the form of a statutory instrument, and the Minister of State has outlined some of the Ministry's thinking on the subject. We still do not know exactly what the stocking rate will be, but perhaps it will be 1·8 cows per hectare. It is clear that more information is to come. When the statutory instrument comes before us, we shall be able to judge precisely the deal that tenants and landlords will have on the standard quota.

I believe that insufficient will be left for the tenant. Although the Minister has said that the tenant's share may be higher than 30 per cent., my hon. Friends and I still need to be convinced on that score. The way to overcome the concerns of many hon. Members about the incoming milk producer and the cost of the quota is to create a pool of quotas, or to have a quota bank of the sort that exists in Canada, where special amounts of quota are put aside for the purposes of incomers. It has beeen said already that the Government created the value of the quota in 1984.

Arbitration on quotas should be much more open-ended. A more even start, with a 50:50 shareout, providing fair valuation should take place with regard to landlords and tenants, incorporating valuation methods that are accepted across the industry, this would be far more equitable. It can be argued that the energy requirements of cows for maintenance, growth and pregnancy can be produced from unfertilised grass. In applying fertiliser and feeding the cows properly, the tenant creates the additional milk production, which has additional value. That is the crux of the argument about why the tenant should have more of the quota value.

I regret very much not having been a member of the Committee, because that would have been an advantage and would have contributed to my input in the debate. I merely add that my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) wishes to protest by proxy, because he was here for two hours of the debate——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is very late, and I do not think that we should start, at this hour of the morning, referring to what other hon. Members might have said had they been here. I hope that we can stick to the matter before the House.

Mr. Livsey: I accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I say merely that this series of amendments could have gone further for tenant farmers.

Mr. Gummer rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the right hon. Gentleman have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Gummer: The quota has a value not because the Government created it but because the European Community argues that the quota cannot legally be taken away from the land: the land is tied to the quota and the quota to the land. Opposition Members are not right on that. What we know now—it is important—is that if there were a Labour Government, the tenants would get nothing, because it would all be taken away from them. Under the proposal, every tenant gets something that he would not have expected to get when he went into the tenancy. The intentions of Opposition Members, we have now discovered, have been wholly unacceptable. They complained that the tenants would not get enough, when they intended to give them nothing whatsoever. I hope that tenants are perfectly aware of that. Quotas would have no value, and they would not get that from a Labour Government.

Mr. John: Is the Minister of State rehearsing for the role of Mr. Facing Both Ways? He was crying over the plight of the incoming tenant a moment ago, and now he is complaining that he will not have to pay more. If he says that the outgoing tenant will not have compensation, by his own argument that will help the incomer. As he is so concerned about newcomers to farming, he cannot argue the case both ways.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has spent three or four months complaining that the outgoing tenant has not been getting enough. Now he tells us that if there is a Labour Government, the outgoing tenant will get nothing whatsoever. I hope that the National Farmers Union knows what the Labour party would do and will therefore again make sure that there is not a Labour Government to implement such a nonsensical scheme.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to.

Dockyard Services Bill

Lords amendments considered

Clause 1

TRANSFER OF PERSONS ENGAGED IN DOCKYARD SERVICES TRANSFERRED TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, leave out lines 3 to 12 and insert

"makes arrangements

(a) for a company to provide designated dockyard services at the dockyard under contract with him, and

(b) for that or another company

(i) to become the employer of such of the qualified dockyard service employees at the dockyard as are employees to whom the arrangements apply, and

(ii) to acquire from him rights in or over the dockyard or any part of it and any property used for the purposes of the dockyard undertaking, with a view to their services and that property being made available for the provision of the designated dockyard services at the dockyard,"

3.30 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider the following Lords amendments: No. 4, in page 2, line 28, leave out "(a)" and insert "(b)"

No. 5, in line 33, leave "(a)" and insert "(b)"

No. 6 in page 3, line 14, after "provides" insert "services which are"

No. 7, in line 16, leave out from "by" to "enables" in line 17 and insert

"making the services of employees or property available,"

No. 8, in clause 2, page 3, line 41, leave out "by the Secretary of State".

Mr. Lee: This amendment and amendments Nos. 4 to 8 refer to the possible company structure at each dockyard.

As the House will recall, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will set up a Companies Act company at each dockyard into which the respective work force would transfer on vesting day in April 1987. Each of these two companies will then be transferred into the ownership of whichever company had successfully tendered to manage the particular dockyard. So far as the structure of the companies which my right hon. Friend sets up is concerned, the Bill allows him to decide which of a number of options is preferable.

Under one option, the company which my right hon. Friend forms would not only employ the work force but would be the company with which he would place the term contract, set initially for a period of seven years, and individual contracts for ship and other refit work. Under this option, there would be one company both contracting and employing at each dockyard. That has been called the concept of the operating company.

Under another option, the term contract and the individual work packages would be placed directly with the successful bidder. The services of the work force employed by the company set up by my right hon. Friend would then be used by the contractor to perform the contract. There would, therefore, be one company contracting — the managing company — and another company — the dockyard or employing company — at each dockyard. On vesting day the dockyard or employing company would become a wholly owned subsidiary of the managing company formed by the successful bidder, at each dockyard. This has been described as the concept of the employing company.

We have always said that there was another option, that of a Government-owned plc — if there were insufficient interest from companies in managing the dockyards or if their responses to our invitation to tender were unacceptable for any reason. I am, however, glad to say that, with three companies, or consortia, interested in bidding for each dockyard, we expect a good competition, which should produce very satisfactory results.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East: Will the Minister explain when he expects vesting day to be? What will be the final date for the submission of tenders? Will he comment on the application by Brown and Root (UK) Ltd., which might lead to an extension of the date by which tenders must be submitted?

Mr. Lee: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's points in due course. There has been no change from the position in Committee about vesting day. Vesting day will be 1 April 1987.

The third of the three companies which have been invited to bid for the contract to manage Devonport dockyard is Brown and Root (UK) Ltd. The company, which was formally invited to tender only last week, has requested an extension to the tender period. The Government welcome the interest which Brown and Root is showing and believe that the competition at Devonport will be significantly improved if an additional bid is made. I should tell the House that the Government have, therefore, agreed to a limited extension of the bid closing date for Devonport by four weeks, to 29 August. This extension will, of course, apply to all potential bidders for Devonport and will not delay the date for the introduction of commercial management to both dockyards of 6 April 1987. I must correct my previous statement that vesting day is to be 1 April 1987. That is incorrect. It is to be 6 April 1987. The date for responses to the invitation to tender for Rosyth remains 1 August.

Returning to the Bill, I was saying that it had always contained the three options for the corporate structure at each dockyard, as amended in another place, the Bill continues to retain all three options. The amendments which we are considering do not relate to the operating company or to the Government-owned plc with which, in relation to the provisions in the Bill, there was general satisfaction in another place. The amendments relate to the employing company concept — the two-company structure.

In another place concern was expressed about the separation of the dockyard work force, which would be in the employing company set up by my right hon. Friend, from the dockyard assets which would be used by the managing company under a licence granted to it by the Ministry of Defence. It was not, however, disputed that the assets should, as has always been our intention, remain in Government ownership.

Our view at one time was that the single company option represented the most attractive scheme for introducing commercial management into the dockyards. However, the principal difficulty with this option is associated with the termination, without renewal with the same contractor, of the term contract. The difficulty that I have in mind concerns the need in those circumstances to disentangle the liabilities of the company. No such difficulty would have to be faced under the two-company structure, where the employees are employed by a company which has attached to it none of the liabilities and obligations of a company which operates the dockyard under one contract.

I can tell the House that we have not ruled out the operating company concept if the difficulties that I have described can be overcome, but in our opinion the two-company structure offers more advantages for the employees and their representatives and for the Government. The companies which have been invited to tender for the contracts to manage the dockyards have been invited, when responding to that invitation, to state their views. In the meantime, however, the Government gave further consideration to ways in which the dislike expressed in another place for the two-company structure could be overcome. The amendments which we are considering were introduced by the Government in another place to address those concerns.

Effectively, the amendments ensure that, in the event of a two-company structure being adopted, the licence to use the assets would be an integral part, not of the managing company set up by the contractor, but of that set up by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and into which would be transferred the dockyard work force. The terms of the licence would, of course, have to be negotiated between the Ministry of Defence and the selected contractor, but on vesting day that licence would come into effect directly between the Department and the company containing the work force. Their Lordships believed that those amendments had met their concerns.

Although these are Government amendments, they were introduced in response to concerns expressed in another place, and I invite the House to accept them.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I am grateful to the Minister for writing to me on 14 July setting out the reasons for the Lords amendments, which he has reiterated. His comments demonstrate what a shambles the Bill is. It began as a shambles and, with the assistance of Lord Denning, it has become an even greater shambles. First, the Government said — and the Minister confirmed — that there would be one company. But we could not have one company, because there was a problem over the determination of the contract in relation to the employees if they were employed by the same company as held the contract and the licence to operate the assets.

In Committee, we were told that there would be two companies — a managing company and an employing company. The employing company was to be formed by the Secretary of State and the employees would be transferred to it. Presumably the shares in the employing company would be transferred to the managing company. The latter was to be owned by a consortium or by a company, if the contract went to only one company, and that management company was to hold the licence to operate the assets.

However, when the Bill went to the House of Lords, Lord Denning discovered the concept of the bees and the hive, and said that we cannot put the workers in one company and the licence to operate the assets—I see the Minister nodding—in another company. I do not know about that. I have read the debates in the other place. The Government were impressed by the arguments about the hive and the bees. Now it seems that the bees and the hive will be in one company—as the Under-Secretary of State said, in the employing company. The managing company will not have anything except shares in the hive and the bees. It will merely operate the dockyards under a managing contract. It will be a strange company, with no assets except, presumably, shares in the employing company.

I think that I preferred the original scheme, when the hive was in the hands of the managing company—I do not know whether the Minister would care to introduce a manuscript amendment to change it again—and the bees were with the employing company. The changes demonstrate the nonsense of the scheme. The nonsense is that the Government retain assets and transfer individuals, but nothing else. There is no transfer, except of employees.

The Government pretend that they are transferring a business, and they have redrafted the Bill to show it; but they are merely transferring people, who are being treated as chattels. The company gets only a licence to operate assets which are owned by the Government. It is a farcical system. Once the Government decided against complete privatisation—hiving everything off—they came out with this hybrid scheme, which is neither private nor public ownership. The problem is that the Bill does not make sense in terms of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employees) Regulations 1981 or the framework of privatisation.

We do not oppose the amendments, because we think that they are nonsense. If the Government are prepared to carry on with this nonsense, that is a matter for them. Nothing is really affected. Will there be one or two companies? Where will the assets be? Presumably they will be with the employing company. Have the Government decided to have two companies? No. They still do not know, although the Minister has said that, if there was one company, there would be great problems with the termination of contracts at the end of seven years or, although it is extremely unlikely, earlier.

There will be the problems of the company's liabilities and debts, of employees being in the company and of the Government's licence to operate the assets. The problems are horrendous. It would have been better if the Government had dropped the Bill rather than grafted one nonsense on to another, which is what the Minister is doing.

No doubt the Minister will tell us more about the company that he has found at the last minute to bid for Devonport—to the relief, no doubt, of the Ministry of Defence. I understand that it is an American company. We will not oppose the amendments. We believe that they are nonsense and that they highlight the nonsense of the Bill.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): This miserable Bill is before us again. The fact that it is 3.30 in the morning and the two other, Conservative, Members of Parliament for Plymouth are not present is a marked criticism of how we conduct our business.

I understand that the Bill was thought to be illegal in European Community law. Lord Denning drew attention to European Commission directive 77 in so far as the assets were being separated from the contractor. I understand that it is because of the threat of a challenge to the Bill that the Government have changed it.

It is extraordinary that we are still talking about three options. It is high time that the Government told the House straight what they intend to do. The company's structure is still utterly unclear. The fundamental flaw in the Bill is its separation of the work force from the assets.

The Minister is a sensible man. He has heard all these arguments and they must drive him towards the logic of a Government-owned public limited company. That is by far the most sensible way out of this largely self-created mess. Now that the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), has flown the coop, we can all agree to drop this nonsense. The agency management proposal has been adjusted and adapted, and it must have taken hours of Civil Service and parliamentary time, to no avail. The Minister now tells us that, because the tenders for the contract in Devonport are wholly inadequate, he as had to extend the contract period by one months and has introduced a new company.

We used to hear about the management option which would solve all our problems. I understand that there have been financial difficulties, but it would have been a great deal better if management had spent its time persuading the Government to opt for a Government-owned plc. If the trade unions were taken into discussions, they would co-operate to make a Government-owned plc the least unsuccessful of all the options. I hope that the Government will consider that in the coming weeks.

3.45 am

The co-operation of the trade unions and the city of Plymouth would be much greater if the Government-owned plc option is chosen and if it was made abundantly clear that the enterprise would stay permamently in Government control and that this was not a stepping stone to later privatisation. The only purpose of keeping open the later privatisation option is to save the Government's face. If that option is kept open, it will undermine the morale of the work force and will not make for a successful Government-owned plc. Ministers know perfectly well that no nationalised company with these expensive assets can possibly be floated. That is why the dockyards cannot be privatised normally.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) that these amendments do not make a hap'orth of difference, except to expose the absurdity of the legislation. We accept them, but hope that the Government will stop proceeding on three options, will opt clearly for a Government-owned plc and will stop the farce of introducing Brown and Root as a new tenderer at this late stage.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): This is an early hour of the morning to debate these amendments.

I must go back to 27 November 1985 and the second report on this matter by the Defence Select Committee. One would think that the Government had suddenly discovered something new in the concept of operating companies. Page 49 of that report contains all the arguments, now suddenly discovered by the Under-Secretary, which were then submitted by the Ministry of Defence to the Select Committee. We must ask ourselves what is new, apart from what happened in the other place?

We are dealing with a small enabling Bill of about 119 lines and we have debated it on Second Reading and in a long Committee stage. It has now returned from the other place. We are sorry that the new Secretary of State does not see fit to grace us with his presence, but I think he wants to distance himself as much as possible from the Bill. The right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) has more sense than the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) in pursuing this stupid proposal.

The idea of operating companies was canvassed by the Ministry of Defence. Hon. Members can read the report and see the criticisms made by potential bidders. The report states:

"The companies interested in the commercial management proposals have seen the concept as an unnecessary complication, since it divorces the company responsible for employing the workforce from the one operating the Dockyard and managing the programme of work."

The balance canvassed at that time was to have the company doing the two things. The Minister, having examined what took place in the House of Lords, has introduced a variation on that theme. He tried to con the House—my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) made, as usual, a succinct intervention — into believing that, notwithstanding, the sacred vesting day of 6 April 1987 will still be met. We do not believe that. We shall turn to the reasons we do not believe that when we consider the further amendments.

The Minister should come clean in parading, at such an early hour of the morning, that he has three consortia bidding for Devonport and, I believe, three consortia bidding for Rosyth. He has not told us anything about the quality of those consortia. He has not told us anything about the balance of expertise they have. I do not think that he will be embarrassed if I refer to a meeting that my hon. Friend and I had with the Secretary of State yesterday. The Minister was present. He introduced the amazing concept that Appledore International had persuaded him that offshore oil work would go to Rosyth. I do not know whether he has been studying the offshore oil industry, but it is difficult to get any sort of contract from the North sea. If the Minister has been persuaded on that, he could be persuaded on almost anything.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Surely my hon. Friend cannot be surprised at Appledore's suggestion when at one stage Touche Ross suggested that the Argentine Navy might be a possible client.

Mr. Douglas: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. Appledore made many suggestions. Knowing your trade union background, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I share it—I am sure that you would quickly call me to order were I to develop those. The Government are desperate to concoct any consortia that will look favourably at bidding for the dockyard contract. We must be careful of accepting what even this pleasant Under-Secretary of State puts forward. I do not think that the exercise will be to the benefit of the Navy, Devonport or Rosyth. I do not think that the Under-Secretary, in his better judment, believes that. We would do better to scrap the whole procedure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East is quite right. I do not think that we can oppose the amendments. However, the Under-Secretary has not given the House a proper justification for how the Government propose to proceed and meet their timetable. He has not given us the necessary information so that hon. Members, trade unions and communities can evalute the consortia that are likely to bid—whatever concept of operating and employing companies is brought into being.

My hon. Friend mentioned Brown and Root. My understanding is that Brown and Root is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Halliburton. As far as I know—I may be wrong—Brown and Root has no experience in operating dockyards but lots of experience in building production platforms for the North sea and elsewhere, in managing construction sites and playing its part in oil refineries and chemical plants.

I should like to probe into what is happening with the management consortium of Devonport plc. I ask the Under-Secretary of State to tell us what is happening at Devonport and Rosyth. The dock's managing directors are simultaneously embarking on what might loosely be called a "management buy-out" and trying to manage the complicated workings of dockyards such as Rosyth and Devonport. How can that be done? What assurances will be given?

When the Select Committee on Defence probed this matter, we were given some vague assurances. We received a letter stating that certain cut-offs and restrictions were imposed on the management preventing them from using the dockyards' facilities. It cannot be true that people of such calibre and expertise in the dockyards can do their job of servicing the Navy while being in cahoots with the Brown and Roots and Foster-Wheelers of this world so that they can collectively make a bid for the operation of the dockyards come vesting day.

At the risk of repeating myself, I must say that, if Conservative Members are concerned about managing the nation, even in the early hours of the morning, they will say, "Take this measure away. It is too daft for words."

Mr. Lee: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker I should like to take up some of the main points raised out of courtesy and, I hope, to add to my earlier explanation. I confirm that there are still three options—the single company concept, the two-company concept and the Government-owned plc.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us exactly when a decision will be made on the option to be favoured by the Ministry of Defence? Can he give us some idea of the Government's timetable?

Mr. Lee: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to speak a little later. I shall come to the timetable later in these overall comments.

As the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said, Brown and Root is a wholly owned subsidiary of Halliburton Holdings, which was formed in December 1984 as a holding company for the United Kingdom interests of its American parent company, Halliburton Holdings Inc.

There are three contenders for the Devonport dockyard —[Interruption.] Hon. Members asked me questions, and I am endeavouring to answer them. There is the consortium of Foster-Wheeler, A and P Appledore and VSEL; the Devonport Dockyard Ltd management involvement; and Brown and Root.

I confirm that vesting day has not changed. We are talking about 6 April 1987. As the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East will know, the management at Rosyth has not formed itself into a company and is not one of the bidders.

I should like to explain the timetable. Tenders were issued on 3 April 1986. We expect receipt of tenders for Rosyth on 1 August and for Devonport on 29 August, which is the adjusted day to which I referred earlier. Broadly in the period August to November, there will be an evaluation of tenders and consideration by the Navy Board and Ministers. By late November, we hope that the contract award will be announced. By early December we hope that the contractors will enter what we term their phasing in period, with a view to commercial management commencing, as I have said, on 6 April 1987.

Question put and agreed to

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 2, line 19, leave out subsection (4) and insert—

"(4) The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 shall apply to the transfer of the dockyard undertaking or any part of it whether or not, apart from this provision, the undertaking would be treated as an undertaking in the nature of a commercial venture for the purposes of those Regulations, and, for those purposes, the services of the qualified dockyard service employees together with the rights in or over th dockyard and property used for the purposes of the undertaking shall be treated as a part of that undertaking capable of being transferred as a business whether or not the company which is to become their employer also provides designated dockyard services."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Lee: I beg to move, as an amendment to the proposed amendment, in line 2, after 'shall', insert 'subject to subsection (4A) below.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to considering the following: Lords amendment No. 3, in page 2, line 26, at end insert—

"(4A) Before any employee in a Royal Dockyard is transferred compulsorily without his consent from the service of the Crown to the service of any other employer the following provisions of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 shall be fulfilled.

(4B) Long enough before the transfer to enable consultations to take place between the Secretary of State and the representatives of the trade unions, the Secretary of State shall inform those representatives of—

(a) the fact that the transfer is to take place, when approximately it is to take place, and the reasons for it;

(b) the legal, economic and social implications of the transfer for the effected employees;

(c) the measures which he envisages he (the Secretary of State) will, in connection with the transfer, take in relation to those employees; and

(d) the measures which the transferee envisages he (the transferee) will, in connection with the transfer, take in relation to such of those employees as become employees of the transferee after the transfer.

(4C) The Secretary of State shall enter into consultations with the representatives of the trade unions and in the course of those consultations shall—

(a) consider any representations made by the trade union representatives, and

(b) reply to those representations, and, if he rejects any of those representations, give his reasons."

Government amendments to the proposed amendment: (a), leave out lines 1 to 5 and insert—

'(4A) The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment Regulations 1981, in their application to the transfer of the dockyard undertaking or any part of it, shall have effect as if, for regulation 10 (duty to inform and consult trade union representatives), there were substituted the provisions of subsections (4B) to (4D) below, and (unless the remedy provided by section (Failure to inform or consult trade unions: High Court and Court of Session remedies) is invoked) the remedies by way of complaint to a industrial tribunal provided for by, and the other provisions of, regulation 11 shall be available and shall apply in relation to those subsections as they would in relation to regulation 10 or any corresponding provision of it.'.

(b), in line 8, leave out 'trade unions' and insert 'independent trade unions recognised by him in respect of the employees'.

(c), in line 9, after 'shall', insert 'in accordance with subsection (8) below,'.

(d), in line 14, leave out 'effected'.

(e), in line 15, leave out '(the Secretary of State)'.

(f), in line 17, after 'employees', insert 'or, if he envisages that no measures will be so taken, that fact'.

(g), in line 18, leave out 'transferee envisages he (the transferee)' and insert 'company which is to become their employer envisages that it'.

(h), in line 20, leave out from 'to' to end of line 21 and insert 'those employees or, if the company envisages that no measures will be so taken, that fact.

(4BB) The company which is to become their employer shall give to the Secretary of State such information at such a time as will enable him to perform the duty imposed on him by virtue of subsection (4B)(d) above.'.

(i), in line 22, after 'State', insert ', where he envisages that he will, in connection with the transfer, be taking measures in relation to employees in respect of whom an independent trade union is recognised by him,'.

(j), in line 28, at end insert—

'(4D) If in any case there are special circumstances which render it not reasonably practicable for the Secretary of State to perform a duty imposed on him by subsection (4B) or (4C) above, he shall take all such steps towards performing that duty as are reasonably practicable in the circumstances.'.

Consequential amendments to the Bill: (k), in page 2, line 13, leave out 'each employee' and insert 'the employees'.

'"trade union" and "independent trade union" have the same meaning as in the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 and "recognised", in relation to an independent trade union, means recognised to any extent for the purpose of collective bargaining (within the meaning of the Employment Protection Act 1975); and any information which is to be given to the representatives of a trade union shall be delivered to them, or sent by post to an address notified by them to the employer, or sent by post to the union at the address of its head or main office.'.

(m), new clause Failure to inform or consult trade unions: High Court and Court of Session remedies—

'(1) A trade union as respects which the Secretary of State has a duty under section 1(4B) or (4C) above to give information or enter into consultations may, where it alleges that the Secretary of State has failed to fulfil that duty, bring an action in the High Court for a declaration as to whether or not he has failed to fulfil that duty, and the Court may make a declaration accordingly.

(2) In Scotland, a trade union as respects which the Secretary of State has a duty under section 1(4B) or (4C) above to give information or enter into consultations may, where it alleges that the Secretary of State has failed to fulfil that duty, raise an action in the Court of Session for a declarator as to whether or not he has failed to fulfil that duty, and the Court may make a declarator accordingly.

(3) No proceedings may be brought under this section if a complaint to an industrial tribunal has been made under the provisions applied by section 1(4A) above.'.

4 am

Mr. Lee: You have said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we are to consider together Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3 and all the Government amendments and consequential amendments to those two amendments. Since they all concern the same regulations it may be for the convenience of the House—particularly at this rather late hour—if I speak about all of them now.

Amendments Nos. 2 and 3 concern the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. As the House will recall, these regulations are the implementation in domestic law of the European Community's acquired rights directive, and their main aim is to safeguard employees' rights when an undertaking is transferred from one employer to another. The sort of rights which are protected include continuity of employment, terms and conditions of service generally, collective agreements and trade union representation.

I should explain that the word "undertaking" is not itself defined in the acquired rights directive, but the 1981 regulations define it so as to exclude any undertaking which is not "in the nature of a commercial venture".

In Committee the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) expressed doubts about whether, given that definition, the regulations would apply to the transfer of the dockyard employees. The Government's view has always been — and remains — that the dockyard undertaking is indeed an undertaking within the meaning of the regulations. The only doubt, in our view, was whether the transfer of the work force alone would be considered a transfer of part of an undertaking within the regulations. Clause 1(4) of this Bill was originally drafted to remove that one doubt.

When the Bill was considered in another place, doubt was again cast on the applicability of the 1981 regulations to the transfer of the dockyards. Although the Government's position on this had not changed, we took the view that the dockyard work force, which had been led by others to believe—wrongly in our view—that their conditions of service might not be protected, should be left in no doubt that the regulations would apply. The Government therefore decided to include in the Bill itself the statement that the regulations

"shall apply to the transfer of the dockyard undertaking or any part of it whether or not, apart from this provision, the undertaking would be treated as an undertaking in the nature of a commercial venture for the purposes of those regulations."

As the Bill has passed through its various stages in this House and in another place it has become clear that all sides wish to ensure that the 1981 regulations will apply in this case. Amendment No. 2 puts it beyond argument that, as the Government have always maintained, the 1981 regulations will apply in the case of the transfer of the royal dockyards. I hope that the Opposition will welcome the amendment.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The hon. Gentleman said that there were doubts originally as to whether a transfer of the workers alone would come within TUPE '81, whether that was because of the commercial point or because there was no undertaking. Now the amendments are tabled to try to put that right. Will the Under-Secretary tell the House what extra is being transferred — the workers are still being transferred — in order to meet TUPE '81? Is anything else being transferred?

Mr. Lee: In a two-company situation, the managing company would hold the term contract for the provision of services and project contracts. The dockyard or employing company, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would set up with a capital of £50,000, would have the work force and the licence to use the assets. On vesting day the dockyard company becomes the subsidiary company of the managing company. As we have said, our intention is to retain the ownership of the fixed assets without change. Nothing additional is passing in that sense.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The hon. Gentleman has now answered the question. Nothing additional is being passed. The transfer is still a transfer of the workers alone. How can we then say that TUPE '81 applies? Presumably, it is because, by a form of words, we have deemed it to apply, but nothing more is being transferred. I still think that the Minister has considerable problems.

Mr. Lee: If the right hon. Gentleman will let me finish covering Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3, I shall refer to those points. I acknowledge that, as far as I am aware, nothing extra is being transferred.

The Government did not support Lords amendment No. 3 in another place. The amendment seeks to set out in the Bill particular provisions in the 1981 regulations. As it is clear that the regulations will apply in their entirety, there is no need to spell out in the Bill any individual regulation or any part of a regulation. These regulations are not there to be followed or ignored by the Government as they see fit. They are the law of the land and there is no question of our not complying with them.

It was not, however, only on a point of principle that the Government opposed the amendment, but also because it did not achieve its main aim of clarifying the Bill. The courts do not read the Official Report when interpreting legislation, and the Government have the duty to ask what a court would make of an Act which provides in one clause that the 1981 regulations will apply but then singles out one particular clause for special mention and provides specifically that that particular regulation is to be fulfilled. The provisions in the Bill, when enacted could well override the similar provisions in the regulations. That would give rise to problems with other parts of the regulations which refer to those provisions which might have been overridden by the Act. In short, there would be a statutory muddle.

Amendment No. 3 cannot, therefore, remain in the Bill in its present form, and to overcome the drafting problems, my noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement has had a number of discussions with representatives of both sides in another place. I am glad to say that they have said that they are content with the amendments that stand in my name—(a) to (m). These remove any doubts caused by the original wording and ensure that the amendments accurately reflect the wishes expressed in another place that the particular sections of the 1981 regulations relating to the duty imposed on an employer to inform and consult trade union representatives should be repeated in the Bill itself.

In the particular circumstances of the dockyards, it was argued in another place that the trade unions should be able to approach the High Court if, in the opinion of the unions, the Secretary of State had failed in his duty to inform or consult them, as necessary. The new clause which I have tabled, and which has been discussed with those concerned in another place, for consideration as a consequential amendment to the Bill, gives the relevant unions the right to bring an action in the High Court or, in Scotland, the Court of Session, for a declaration or a declarator respectively to that effect. Alternatively, the unions could make a complaint to an industrial tribunal, as provided for under regulation 11 of the 1981 regulations.

It is not, of course, for me, or indeed for this House, to anticipate the reactions of another place if these amendments have to be considered there again, but it is my hope that another place will not insist on its amendments and will accept the amendments which the Government now propose.

I should make clear that the need for compliance with the regulations in this and in all other respects has always been recognised in our plans for introducing commercial management to the royal dockyards by April 1987. No new obligations are imposed on the Ministry of Defence as a result of repeating in the Bill itself some of the provisions of the 1981 regulations, and our time scale remains unchanged.

What the amendment does—this was, I believe, the main intention of another place—is to highlight the need for consultation. The Government continue to hope for realistic discussions with the trade unions representing the work force at the dockyards. If the inclusion of this part of the regulations helps to bring this about, this amendment will have served some purpose. So that no one should be in any doubt, however, the amendment also refers, in words which echo the 1981 regulations, to the fact that if it is not reasonably practicable for the Secretary of State to consult—for example, because of a refusal on the part of the unions to take part in such consultations—it will be sufficient that he shall have taken all such steps to consult

"as are reasonably practicable in the circumstances."

I hope that when the Bill has completed its parliamentary stages, the trade unions will start in earnest the process of consultations.

Mr. O'Neill: This group of amendments, which are primarily concerned with implementing TUPE '81 and seek to ensure that proper consultations take place, are long overdue. The consultation process relating to the contractorisation of the dockyards has had a chequered history. In paragraph 19 of its report dated 10 July 1985 the Select Committee on Defence said:

"The Committee accepts the view of a majority of witnesses that the time allowed for consultation was much too short. We further consider that the MOD's handling of the consultation process has been inept and insensitive."

Tribute must be paid to Lord Denning for taking the relevant phrases and words out of TUPE '81 and enshrining them explicitly in this proposal.

We are still implacably opposed to the contractorisation concept, but we are not blind to the fact that the Government have a large majority and that they may have the legislation in the bag by the end of this week. Therefore, it is essential to establish appropriate means whereby the trade union movement can be consulted and, I hope, conciliated.

We are talking about a relatively short consultation period. The Select Committee on Defence appropriately condemned the Government for their failures on the last occasion. Therefore we hope that they will reconsider the timetable and the proposed date of 6 April 1987. TUPE '81 referred to the consultation period being long enough. Amendment (l) says that the information should be provided in writing. Adequate time should be given to enable the trade unions to respond in writing, and that might take a considerable time.

One notes the recent record of the Ministry of Defence on the amount of time and notice that it has given the trade unions over the manpower target consultation procedures. The manpower target for 1985 should have been notified to the trade unions in April 1984, but it was not notified to the unions until January 1985. The manpower target for 1986 should have been available in April 1985, but it was not available until August 1985. Despite the strictures of the Select Committee on Defence, the Ministry of Defence has a deplorable record over providing information and making it available to the trade unions in a form that they can handle and deal with quickly and effectively.

I am sure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will remember from your previous incarnation as a Minister with responsibility for employment that consultation procedures on redundancy were made available to the unions. When there would have been redundancies involving more than 100 people, 90 days were allowed for consultations and discussions. In a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) reference was made to the likelihood of even more redundancies because of the introduction of new work practices in the dockyards.

Perhaps the proposed consultative process is not new, but we are certainly led to believe that there has to be enough time and that adequate information has to be provided to discuss the legal, economic and social impact on employees. That makes it perfectly clear that at any stage the trade unions will be able to question the selection of a company. They can raise the matter of the legal status of the company and whether or not it has a sufficiency of British interest.

During the debate two firms with substantial American shareholdings were mentioned, and the trade unions could ask whether or not those shareholdings are consistent with undertakings already given. One might say that that is the first fence at which the Government could fall. By that I mean that the unions could if they wished apply to the High Court. In the case of the Court of Session I have been advised that a declarator ab ante could be applied for, and that would stop the Government in their tracks. It would not simply be a matter of the Government having to make a response, because it would enable the objectors to prevent the Government from carrying on with any of the other aspects of giving effect to the contract.

If that is the case, this could be a legal minefield for the Government. If it is not the case, the Under-Secretary's noble Friend in another place will have rather a difficult job convincing the noble Lords that the exercise they have gone through was worth while. In the words of the Government, substantial concessions have been made to the representations in another place. Is the Minister telling us that those substantial concessions will enable the whole consultative process to be carried through in three or four weeks? It seems that in the case of Devonport the period is getting shorter because we have already taken a month out of the process.

If the Minister intends that the result of this wretched Bill will be a consultative process lasting perhaps three or four weeks, he has another think coming, because he will find that difficult. If the trade unions are to fulfil their responsibilities to their members, they will need to take far longer than that. The record of the Ministry of Defence on consultations is not a good one. If the trade unions are not given sufficient time, we will see long legal wrangles on legality and on the economic and social impacts on the communities in Devonport and Rosyth.

These things are matters of interpretation and the courts will have to decide. We can only indicate what we consider to be the substance of this group of amendments. As I said earlier, Lord Denning has spelt that out in detail in his amendment and the Minister's amendment clearly shows that the unions will have a means of raising their misgivings.

As I understand it — perhaps the Minister can confirm my understanding—they will be able to do that only when the Government have finally chosen a contractor for each of the two yards. The process of consultation cannot start until the Government have chosen the contracting company.

Mr. Lee indicated dissent.

Mr. O'Neill: The Minister is shaking his head and others will have to advise us what the outcome may be. But, as we understand it, the words are drawn in such a way that it will be only when the contractors have been selected that the process of consultation can start. If the Minister does not think that that is the case I can only say that trade unions will not waste their time entering into consultations about hypothetical firms which may or may not have plans for the contractual process. If he believes that the contractual process can somehow start as soon as the Bill receives the Royal Assent, he is living in a fool's paradise.

Labour Members know that that is a fool's paradise which he and his hon. Friends have constructed over the years and months that have preceded this evening. We do not wish the legislation well. We recognise that this is an improvement, in the sense that it affords workers clearer and more explicit rights than they have enjoyed before and remedies which we suspect they will have to exercise sooner rather than later on the whole question of consultation. We get the impression that, despite the negotiations and discussions that have taken place with another place, the Government, like the Bourbons, have learned nothing and forgotten nothing.

Dr. Owen: This is a much more important amendment. Indeed, like the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), I think that it is important to congratulate the noble Lord, Lord Denning. It is important, too, to remember that Lord Denning was a Recorder of the city of Plymouth and that he has great affection for the city. Indeed, when he began to examine the legislation he started his memorandum by saying that he was on the side of the dockyard matey. I must say that I am, too. It is apparent that the Government have taken no notice whatever of the interests of the dockyard matey.

I do not want to embarrass the Minister, but on 16 July he wrote to the hon. Member for Clackmannan saying:

"I really do think that the amendment"— effectively the one that we have now—

"would be unwise from all our points of view."

He went on to say:

"We could not go as far as adding Lord Denning's new point on the High Court"— but now on 24 July we suddenly have it.

The reason is that the Bill is under serious threat of not being able to meet its timetables. The Government fear that in another place they would not be able to sustain the Bill. The importance of this is that one would no longer be able to go through the industrial tribunal, but would have to go too the High Court.

First, let us be clear, that there is no doubt whatever that the consultations must be with the contracting party. There is no way that they can be with the Government. Take the case of Devonport and Mr. Johnston, the general manager of the dockyard there. Mr. Johnston, as general manager of the dockyard, cannot have a consultation wearing one hat, while in another hat he is putting his application in to be the contractor who will be the commercial organisation who will employ those people. There is no way that the High Court will accept that Mr. Johnston is capable of conducting negotiations under two hats. There is no question that the wording of the amendment means that the consultations will have to come after the tenders have been taken and the contracts awarded.

The Government may think that they will now have a generalised consultation with the dear old Ministry of Defence, that that will meet the book and that there will be no other questions, but that will be challenged in the High Court. They have not got a prayer. The whole purpose of the consultations is that the contracting parties are in effect making arrangements under the terms of this new legislation. The importance of that is that the Government cannot possibly meet any of the deadlines. I do not know whether the Minister in accepting the amendment knows that. I suspect that he does, and that he is getting his legislation and saving the face of the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). The latter has landed us all in the cart with this ludicrous legislation. The Minister will then, I hope, announce shortly that he is going for a Government plc. I hope that he also does the same for Rosyth. There is no possibility of going ahead in Devonport, unless the Minister wants to face an action in the High Court. I understand that there is every intention to take the matter to the High Court.

There was one marvellous moment in the Minister's speech when he implied that there was a great tradition of Ministry of Defence consultation. That is just a joke. There has been no consultation on this legislation. The lack of consultation has been criticised by the all-party Select Committees, all of which have looked at the matter. During the process of this legislation great damage has been done to the word consultation. No one in the dockyard believes that the Minister has ever been consulted seriously. The Minister should be under no illusion. As a result of the new clause, proper consultation on the Bill will be forced. It will be consultation with the contracting party,. and things are likely to go to the High Court. There is no way that this legislation can now be squeezed in without the contractor facing the certainty of legal action, with all the costs and delay that that will involve. The amendment is, therefore, important, and I congratulate Lord Denning, former Master of the Rolls, on being so effective.

Mr. Gordon Brown: There are good reasons why the House should not be detained to consider these amendments, but, like other hon. Members, I do not believe that the Minister appreciates the seriousness or importance of the amendments passed in the other place.

The Minister does not seem to appreciate the full extent of the duty that is placed on him and his Department in respect of consultation. The amendments passed in the other place, which have been refined before being brought before us, call for a process of consultation. They call, not just for a meeting here and there, but for a process of continuous consultation. They also state that that consultation must take place long before the transfer of the dockyards to private contractors. The amendments also make it clear that that consultation must involve the transfer of information in a written form and that the Government must await the response of the trade unions and the workers' representatives to their information.

Above all, the amendments make it clear that the consultation is about the biggest questions as they affect employees—the legal, economic and social implications of any transfer of the dockyard management to the private sector. The legal, social and economic consequences involve everything affecting the individual employees and the collective group of them at Rosyth and Devonport. The Government will have to be honest about the likely job losses as a result of the transfer, and about the threat to apprenticeships. They must explain what is likely to happen to the local economies in those dockyard areas, and they must also explain in detail what is likely to happen to the rights of individual employees, and of employees as trade union members.

Having read the reports of the debates in another place, I cannot understand how the Minister can say that his timetable remains entirely unchanged. It is worse than that, because he has told us that his timetable has slipped for tenders coming into his office. That means that there will be less time for consultation on the tenders and on what any preferred contractor is to do. The Minister insists, however, that he will transfer the dockyards to the private sector in April 1987.

4.30 pm

The position is even worse than that, because the Minister has told us bluntly that he intends that the private contractors shall be in the dockyards in December. In 1985, when the Ministry of Defence announced its first timetable for the transfer to the private sector, it hinted that there would be a period of parallel running with a private contractor and the Ministry of Defence from the spring of 1987. However, the Minister has confirmed that it is intended that the period of parallel running will begin in December.

In one sense, the transfer will take place in December, although the formal vesting day will be April 1987. The Minister leaves us with the possibility that he will make a decision about a private contractor, the preferred contractor, in November, and that the contractor will be in each yard in December.

The Ministry's record on consultation over this entire business is pathetic and shabby. That has been said by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), and my hon. Friend drew attention to what the Select Committee on Defence had said about previous consultations. Having issued a consultative document, the Ministry tried to complete the consultation within 13 weeks. The Select Committee took the view that it was not serious about consultation and claimed that through their handling of the consultation process the Government had forfeited much of the good will that might have been forthcoming for any attempt to secure a long-term future for the yard. Having received a severe and serious rebuke from the Select Committee, I would have thought the Minister would learn from the mistakes that had been made and construct a timetable, with or without the amendment that has been introduced by Lord Denning, that would allow for proper consultation.

I shall give the Minister one example of the problem that he faces, and I hope that he will explain how he will overcome it. Amendment No. 3 says that the Secretary of State must inform the representatives of the trade unions long enough before the transfer about the measures which the transferee

"envisages he . . . will, in connection with the transfer, take in relation to such of those employees as become employees of the transferee after the transfer."

That is a detailed requirement that is placed on the Secretary of State. It is a period of consultation within which information must be exchanged between the trade unions and the Government, and they must be given time to respond.

For that period of consultation to begin, there must be a transferee and a nominated contractor. There must be someone who has been nominated as the contractor to take over Devonport, and someone else who has likewise been nominated to take over Rosyth. The Minister tells us, however, that he will not be in a position to make an announcement until the middle, or towards the end, of November. That period of consultation cannot begin until the announcement is made, and I hope that if he is going ahead with the transfer the announcement will be made at the first instance.

Towards the end of November the Minister will announce the contractor who will take over the dockyard, and he proposes that the contractor will be inside the yard and working at the beginning of December. The period of consultation on the implications of the transfer will probably be about three or four days, and the maximum of 10 days. Does the Minister ask us seriously to accept that that is a long enough period for consultation to allow all the legal, social and economic implications of what he is doing to be understood? There is no doubt in my mind, and the minds of all Opposition Members, I think, that the Minister plans to effect part of the transfer by the beginning of December. It is an unacceptable timetable, and quite the worst possible circumstances in which to expect reasonable consultation. I can hardly believe that letters could be delivered and exchanged within the time, far less that serious consultation can take place.

There is one other problem that the Minister has to resolve. The Secretry of State for Scotland wrote me a letter on 16 July, in which there was a new announcement of Government policy affecting the Ministry of Defence, but announced by the Secretary of State for Scotland. He said that there were potential reductions in the numbers of people required in Rosyth and Devonport dockyards, and that it had been known for some time that the defence work load available to Rosyth and Devonport would decline. Although some of the unallocated programme may go to Devonport and Rosyth as a result of the changes, and perhaps also some additional commercial work, the implication of the letter is that that could do nothing more than offset some of the job losses that have for some time been a possibility.

The Ministry of Defence talks about how serious it is about consultation. A policy has been announced in a letter from the Secretary of State for Scotland that the defence work load at Rosyth will decline. The Minister has never consulted the trade unions on that nor previously informed Members of Parliament during 70 hours of Committee work on the Bill. An assumption that there will be job losses is written into the letter. There was a lack of consultation with the trades unions before the Secretary of State for Scotland — not the Ministry of Defence — announced that to me in a letter. It seems that the Minister has learnt nothing from the period of discussion and debate, which has been fraught with so many difficulties and criticisms from such a wideranging group of people about the Minister's failure to consult.

If the Minister does not change his timetable, he faces not only one court action in either the Court of Session in Scotland or courts in England, but a series of court actions on a range of different issues, which will make the life of the Ministry of Defence intolerable and mean that the fate of the dockyards will be decided in the courts of law instead of where it should properly be decided, in the House, after proper consultation with the trade unions.

We have said all along that the Bill and its proposals are bad for the taxpayer because they will cost more; that they are bad for the work force because they will mean redundancies and deteriorating conditions of service; and that they are bad for the proper defences of the country. Under the Minister's new announcement, the running of the dockyards may be put in the hands of yet another foreign company. It is equally bad that the Minister is prepared to accept Lord Denning's amendment — I praise his work in another place — in theory, but in practice will do nothing to make a reality of the consultation that he promises. He is therefore treating the work force and the trades unions with contempt. If he does not change his mind over the next few weeks, he will face a series of legal actions in the courts that will force him to climb down. I wish that he would be honest with the House and say that his timetable has to change and that his Bill has no chance of being implemented before a general election, which should properly decide the issue in the constituency that I represent.

On resuming—

Mr. Douglas: I shall be brief, but not because the amendment is not important.

Others have paid tribute to Lord Denning. He has drawn attention to consultation and revealed what we did not previously know about the Government in that regard. They have laid on a veneer of consultation, but tried to drive through their views, which have been essentially those of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). They have tried to convince the work force that the option that they always had in mind was the realistic one.

The Select Committee on Defence drew attention to the farce of consultation in two unanimous reports, the Government's responses to which were pretty pithy. Nobody could have had any faith that the Government's consultation process was meaningful. We know that the Government intend to attack fairly severely the load on dockyards, and to reduce the naval load from 80 per cent. to 70 per cent. Unless there is some other work about which we know nothing, that represents an attack on and an undermining of the work force.

The Government acknowledge — my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) mentioned the Secretary of State for Scotland's letter — that the naval ships that are being developed and built will require less manpower than earlier ones. That also will entail a reduction in the work force. The Government tell the Select Committee and the Public Accounts Committee that they will achieve a saving. They will quantify the saving in money terms, but not in employment terms.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us how there will be a reduction in the load factor, a change of quality, a saving and, more important, what will happen to the labour force. The Minister has an obligation to the communities that will be affected to come clean. Communities can make adjustments to employment changes in time. In Fife, we have had to make enormous adjustments to the decline in the mining labour force. Unfortunately, that process continues, but communities can adjust if they are given time and proper Government support.

All those factors are missing in the legislation. I shall not plead that we should employ people in the dockyards because it is a socially worthy thing to do, but the dockyards are in the public domain and the Government employ those people, so there is an overwhelming obligation on the House to ensure that the Government discharge their duties responsibly.

The Defence Select Committee unanimously criticised the Government for a lack of consultation and unanimously cast doubts on the measure. Government expect the Opposition to oppose and criticise legislation, but legislation with any merit will gather friends and support during its passage. At each stage, this paltry four-clause Bill has had fewer friends. There is no supporter from any dockyard community on the Government Benches. I know that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) has difficulties because she is a member of the Chairman's Panel.

I plead with the Minister, if he cannot scrap the proposals, at least to declare that the Government's intention is to opt for a Government-owned plc — I would prefer no change—and to see that the timetable for consultation is adhered to meaningfully and discussed with an extremely loyal labour force which has brought benefit to the nation.

Mr. Lee: No one would welcome a lengthy reply, but I must make some brief points.

We are and have been ready to consult since April 1985. Contractor selection will be completed by late November and consultation will continue through to vesting day. As I said in relation to the timetable which I set out earlier, we are talking about a full four months between the selection of the contractor for the particular yards and the date of 6 April when commercial management begins.

We have provided alternative procedures by which a union may allege that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has failed in his obligation to inform or consult. My Department will continue to spare no effort to comply with what will be its statutory obligations. For that reason, we are confident that proceedings alleging a failure to inform or consult will be bound to fail, whether they are commenced in an industrial tribunal, the High Court or the Court of Session. At an industrial tribunal, a union may seek a declaration under regulation 11 of the 1981 regulations that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has failed to inform or consult. If that allegation is well founded, the tribunal will make a declaration to that effect, and if appropriate, order the payment of compensation to affected employees of up to two weeks' pay. A tribunal's declaration would not vitiate the effectiveness in law of a transfer. An appeal from an industrial tribunal would lie on a point of law to an employment appeal tribunal and thereafter, with leave, an appeal would be taken to the Court of Appeal or, in Scotland, to the Court of Session.

The Bill will now also provide for an alternative procedure for establishing a failure to fulfil statutory obligations. A union will have to choose. It could not begin in the High Court and then decide to go to an industrial tribunal; the procedures are mutually exclusive. The High Court can make a declaration as to whether or not the Secretary of State has failed to fulfil his duty to inform or consult. In Scotland the Court of Session may make a declarator to the same effect. The alternative procedure would not allow the High Court or Court of Session to set aside the transfer of the dockyard undertaking at either dockyard authorised by the Secretary of State.

Mr. O'Neill: The courts cannot stop the process of transfer, but they can freeze it until such time as the consultations are properly conducted. That could seriously delay the programme that we consider to be far too short. That is the significant change from Lord Denning's suggestion.

Mr. Lee: That is the hon. Gentleman's judgment. It is not mine, the Government's or Ministers'. We have every intention of bringing in commercial management by 6 April 1987.

£2 Note

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

5.2 am

Sir Marcus Fox (Shipley): I thought that it was a stroke of luck when I heard that I had succeeded in getting an Adjournment debate. At 5 o'clock in the morning, I am reviewing that rather rapidly. I assure my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury that I shall not keep him any longer than necessary to put across the points I wish to make. I thought that today was going to be a memorable day, which it was. It was memorable because of the royal wedding, especially as we now have a Duke and Duchess of York, which gives me particular gratification. The memorable day has extended into a memorable morning. I hope the good news will not stop there. Perhaps my hon. Friend will say a few kind words about my subject for debate and suggest that we should introduce a £2 note.

I do not ask my hon. Friend to go back to the debate we had on 20 December 1983. It only seems like yesterday when we debated the introduction of a plastic pound. That was thrown out of court, for a number of reasons, one of which was the ease of counterfeiting, the difficulties of watermarks, and so on. The Minister accepted that the policy of introducing a £1 coin was too well advanced.

A number of things have happened since then. One is that we have virtually conquered inflation. Only in the past few days, a Bank of England spokesman said that there were no plans to introduce a £2 note. He said:

"the spending power of a £2 note today would be less than that of the old 10 shilling note before its withdrawal 17 years ago."

That would be a dangerous argument for the Treasury to accept. It would be to assume that inflation would not be held at its present level, or go lower, as we expect, but that it might go back to the level of the old days when it was in the teens or, dare I suggest, the 26 per cent. under another Government. The argument of inflation as mentioned in our last debate has, I think, receded.

The acceptance of the pound coin is a fact. I do not argue that there should be a change in that direction. The general public feel that there are far too many coins in our purses and pockets, and there are constant complaints. My proposal will go a considerable way towards readjusting the balance.

In the earlier debate on the £1 coin, the Minister said that he would reconsider if there were a more durable substance. I am happy to tell my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that perhaps the largest company making banknote paper has confirmed that paper is now available which has twice the life of the old £1 note. If such paper had been available a couple of years ago, the £1 coin might not have been introduced.

The company to which I refer exports to about 120 companies around the world which use this high-durability paper to produce banknotes; yet in the United Kingdom, where one would expect this use to be encouraged, it is used only for higher denomination notes. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary told me that it would cost £3 million a year to keep the old £1 note in circulation. In the case of a higher denomination note of more lasting quality, presumably the cost would be nothing like £3 million a year. If private banks in Scotland can produce their own £1 notes, and bear the cost, is it beyond the Treasury's capability to introduce such notes?

Another reason why I thought that I should raise this subject is that there seems to be a plot to introduce the £2 coin. Indeed, I saw my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary pull one out of his pocket a few minutes ago. To my horror, today's newspaper contains an advertisement by the Royal Mint which tells us that a new £2 coin is available from post office now. Such coins have been available for several weeks from the parliamentary post office. They have been passed around. One member of the Whips Office — that certainly gives substance to the story — has been regularly passing the new £2 coin to taxi drivers whenever he can. He enjoys it.

The advertisement says that the £2 coin has been struck for a special reason, but, like the £1 coin, it is legal tender. I believe that we should therefore have a full debate on it. As I was outmanoeuvred last time, because the £1 coin had been produced before I could debate the matter, I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will confirm that at the moment there are no plans to introduce a £2 coin. We can argue a great deal about whether there should be a £2 note or coin.

Seven coins are in circulation—too many. If another coin is introduced, the time will rapidly approach when our coinage system has to be reorganised. Coin size bears no resemblance to value. The cost to the Treasury of that reorganisation will be considerable. The introduction of a £2 note would lessen the need to embark upon such costs.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary accepts that there is a gap in our currency. In the chemistry laboratory, the weights one, two, and five are important. The same proportions apply to some of our coins, with the 10p, 20p and 50p, but there has always been a gap between £1 and £5. There is nothing in the middle. However, we have £10 notes, £20 notes and £50 notes. It would have helped us a considerable time ago if there had been a £2 note. It was never obvious when change was being given in pound notes. However, now if one changes a fiver for a small purchase and gets four £1 coins, it is obvious to many people that there is a need for something in the middle range. I could give numerous examples. Canada, for example, only needs four coins—one cent, five cent, 10 cent and 25 cent pieces—and they manage extremely well with the rest in bank notes. The United States has been quoted regularly.

These are early days in this debate. However, I have had support from people in all walks of life and from retailers and traders. Let us have our £1 coin but look to the future. I believe that a £2 note would make the Treasury a little more popular than at present—I am trying to be kind. Perhaps the time is approaching when popularity may be acceptable, even in that important Department.

5.10 am

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I was going to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) on obtaining this debate. However, my compliments and congratulations would have been in better order a few hours ago, and perhaps this is not the ideal time to discuss such important matters as possible £2 notes and the structure of the currency. Nevertheless, I would like to thank my hon. Friend for the courtesy with which he has put forward his ideas and also for their relative brevity. I shall try to respond in kind.

I should like to add one or two footnotes to the debate we had two and a half years ago. It is interesting that one of the advantages of the £1 coin, which I then mentioned, was that it would be useful for slot machines and vending machines. I am glad to say that in gas and electricity meters, telephones, ticket machines, food and cigarette dispensing machines and so on there has now been a substantial measure of conversion and the coin is useful for that purpose.

I was much criticised at the time by the charities, which said that people would never slip a £1 coin into an envelope and send it and that they would lose out. What has happened is that some people now send fivers. Of course, we need only one person to send a fiver and we get as much as five people sending a pound note each. Charities also found that whereas nobody would fold up notes to put in collection tins, people have now been putting £1 coins into the tins. Therefore, the pattern has changed a little differently from what was expected at the time and I am glad that the ideas we had have been borne out in practice.

We are not replaying that debate. My hon. Friend fairly accepts that the £1 coin is now established. I think that the point he raised about the gap between the £5 note and the £1 coin is interesting. However, historically it is not very different from the gap when I was a schoolboy, between the 10-shilling note and the half crown. Indeed, going back a few years before that, when the pattern of currency was the same, the purchasing power of the 10-shilling note and the half crown was relatively greater.

The problem with a £2 note is that there is not much to lead us to believe that it would be treated by the public in a manner different from the £1 note. Double denomination notes have not proved very satisfactory in the few countries where they have been tried. For example, in France the 20-franc note has obtained only about 4 per cent. of the note circulation. In the United States, the $2 note has achieved less than that—only about 3 per cent. of the note circulation. If there ever were a case for a £2 note, it has probably passed. The difficulty, which I explained to my hon. Friend and to many others when we introduced the £1 coin, was not just the cost of replacing notes rapidly but the difficulty of keeping notes in circulation in good enough condition.

My hon. Friend referred to the better quality paper that can be used. I can identify from what he said the company to which he was referring, and I have discussed the matter with it. However, it is not just the paper, but the treatment of it, and the way in which the note is used. The pound note was circulating like a coin, by being folded up into a small size and stuffed into pockets and purses. No note will last long in those conditions. I remain to be convinced that the same sort of thing would not happen to a £2 note.

One of the things that leads me to say that is that there has been a shift in the public's use of notes in the past few years towards the higher denominations. This is not part of Government policy in the management of the currency; it is the choice of the public. In 1982, the number of £5 notes in circulation formed 27·6 per cent.—well over a quarter—of the notes in circulation, by value. Today, it is below 20 per cent., as the proportion taken by £10 and £20 notes rises. That suggests that the £2 note would be more likely to be treated like the old £1 than like a £5 note, which is becoming less used.

On that basis, I am not convinced that there is a powerful case for a £2 note. At one time there might have been a useful slot for it. I accept my hon. Friend's explanation of £1, £2 and £5, and also that we have rather a lot of coins. This is inevitably what happens after a period of rapid inflation, such as we had in the 1970s. One has to reorganise the coinage, because in the coins of the old sizes, the lower denominations are much too large for their purchasing power.

We have taken a number of steps. First, decimalisation gave us an opportunity to change the size of the penny, and subsequently there have been other changes—for example, the introduction of the 20p coin, which does service for two large 10p coins. That has served to reduce the weight of the currency. I agree that so many different coins make a certain untidiness, and I have no doubt that there will be changes to make a better balance without too much weight.

Although many people have said that the £1 coin contributes a great deal extra to the weight of the coinage, it is substantially lighter than the 10p coin. The 10p and 5p, and to some extent the 50p, coins cause the main weight in the purse or pocket. I am sure that my hon. Friend is conscious of that, and of the fact that we are considering what changes might be needed. None is immediately planned, but we consider the subject, and research is being done on it.

My hon. Friend pointed out that Scottish banks can maintain a circulation of pound notes at their own expense. That is true, but they do not have a national responsibility for keeping that type of currency in good condition. The Bank of England, on behalf of the Government, would be bound to keep it in good condition. Although Scottish pound notes are still quite plentiful, I am afraid that they are beginning to show signs of rapid deterioration just as English pound notes did a few years ago. Even in America I understand that much more serious consideration is now being given to replacing the dollar bill by a dollar coin. I am told that what will swing it will be when the dollar is a minimum basic amount for subway fares. As soon as slot machine requirements reach a certain point, a coin will be needed.

My hon. Friend also asked me about the £2 coin. I assure him absolutely that at present there are no plans to introduce a £2 coin for general circulation. The reason for the £2 denomination of the Commonwealth Games coin is partly because the tradition of having a crown, which is only 25p, has made it rather expensive to produce suitable commemorative coins with so low a face value. It costs quite a lot to produce a special coin for such an occasion. In many respects, 25p does not now meet the costs of production and distribution. It was felt that the new denomination, which was not already in circulation, might be suitable. For that purpose, the £2 coin was chosen.

That amount has been represented by a coin in the past. It was a gold coin then. In modern times, however, a £2 coin is an innovation. For practical reasons, we could not have a £2 coin of the kind that we have struck for the Commonwealth Games this week in general circulation alongside the 10p coin, which is of almost identical diameter. It would be much too confusing. This is not an attempt to upstage my hon. Friend's idea. We wanted merely to have a convenient denomination for a commemorative coin. I am glad that it has received a good welcome, and it will serve very well its purpose as a commemorative coin.

My hon. Friend said that it is legal tender, and he is quite right. Technically, all commemorative coins are legal tender. We could go into a sweet shop with one of the old commemorative crowns and use it to buy a bar of chocolate, just as we could use the £2 Commonwealth Games coin. However, that does not mean that we plan to introduce it as a general currency coin. If ever that time came, it would have to be considered in the light of the circumstances.

I apologise for having been unable to give a more enthusiastic welcome to my hon. Friend's idea. A £2 note might have been convenient at one time, but it would not be convenient now. My hon. Friend referred to the most telling statistic: that £2 buys less now than a 10-shilling note would have bought when it was withdrawn from circulation. In 1969 it was felt that that amount of purchasing power would no longer sensibly be represented by a note. The same reasons led us to issue the £1 coin and phase out the £1 note. The arguments since 1969 over the lowest note denomination and what should be represented by a coin have changed very little.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that we have given careful thought to his idea. As he may know, I have a personal interest in coinage and currency. I have studied the subject for many years, and for that reason I always look at ideas of the kind put forward by my hon. Friend with an open mind to see whether they might be worth following up. I have looked at his idea, but I am not convinced that it would be right to introduce a £2 note. However, I thank him for the way in which he has put forward the suggestion.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Damage

1. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to seek to reduce the incidence of criminal damage.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): The Home Office crime prevention unit has issued guidance to local authority chief executives and chief officers of police on local crime prevention practice, including environmental improvements and anti-vandalism campaigns. The Department of the Environment is taking a number of initiatives to reduce the incidence of crime on estates; community programme resources are being used for cleaning up graffiti and criminal damage; and the Department of Education and Science has commissioned research on the nature and extent of wilful damage to educational buildings and property and on cost-effective and practical solutions.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Home Secretary confirm that since 1979 and 1983, when enormous promises were made, crime rates have soared and the incidence of criminal damage offences has risen dreadfully so that today, in Conservative Britain, one such offence is committed, on average, every minute? Will he at least ensure that local authorities are given adequate capacity to respond to and clear up after such offences without delay?

Mr. Hurd: In the hon. Gentleman's area of South Yorkshire there has been a reduction in such incidents over the past six months, so the pattern varies. The hon. Gentleman is too fair a debater to fall into the trap of trying to argue that these evils were invented in 1979. Of course they were not. I agree that we need the multi-agency approach which I outlined in my reply, and which certainly involves the local authorities in putting things right.

Mr. Colvin: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the damage, admittedly not all of it criminal, done by hippie convoys? What action will his Department take following the Prime Minister's initiative in the working group of Ministers to liaise with the Department of the Environment about providing additional powers for both police and planning authorities so that they can take immediate action on trespass, thereby preventing what could result in considerable damage to property?

Mr. Hurd: We have been in close concert, not only with the Department of the Environment, but with hon. Members and their constituents. This morning my hon. Friend the Minister of State met a delegation which included my hon. Friend's constituents. As the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State said in another place, we are close to being able to reveal the proposal which we intend to add to the Public Order Bill and which will come to the House for consideration.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the incidence of criminal damage is only part of a greater pattern of lawlessness? Does he also agree that protestations from Opposition Members about such matters would carry a great deal more weight if prospective Labour parliamentary candidates and councillors did not use every opportunity to attack the police?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. In practice they ran down the police when they were in office, and many of the Labour party's candidates and local government leaders run down the police at every opportunity even now.

Mr. Kaufman: How does the Home Secretary reconcile the statement in the 1983 Conservative election manifesto, that already street crime was being reduced and public confidence improved in some of the worst inner city areas, with the 73 per cent. increase in criminal damage since this Government came to office?

Mr Hurd: There is no doubt about the continued increase in crime, including criminal damage, which has now been going on for 30 years. The distinction between the two main parties is that we have a coherent policy for dealing with all aspects of this problem, whereas some, though not all, members of the Labour party, which is far from having a coherent policy, do their best to undermine what is being achieved.

"Black Widow" Catapults.

2. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representation he has received concerning the unrestricted sale of "Black Widow" catapults.

The Minister of State, Home Department (Mr. Giles Shaw): A few hon. Members, the Association of County Councils and one police authority have recently expressed concern about "Black Widow" catapults.

Mr. Shepherd: Is my hon. Friend aware that other organisations, as well as the public, are deeply perturbed about this particular variant of the old-fashioned catapult, not least the RSPCA, which considers it to be potentially foully lethal to animals? Does he agree that any implement that advertises the capability of being able to heave a 5/16 in steel ball 225 yards with accuracy is not an inoffensive weapon? Will he take a very much more stringent attitude to this question than he has shown in recent answers to parliamentary questions, and advise carefully on how this instrument should be sold?

Mr. Shaw: I am very concerned at the sale of a wide range of implements that can be misused in public. My hon. Friend will know that the law on using at item as an offensive weapon is sufficiently tight to catch this kind of offence, should it be committed in public. As my hon. Friend draws attention to the fact that these items are widespread and that there is public concern on the issue, I shall monitor the situation extremely carefully.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Minister make representations to W. H. Smith to try to stop it selling the magazine "Survival Weaponry Techniques", which glorifies weapons such as these "Black Widow" catapults and offers a huge range of wicked weapons for sale by post to teenagers and others without any real restraint whatsoever? Will he recognise that this is an urgent matter about which something should be done, instead of merely talking about it?

Mr. Shaw: I fully recognise that point, and in relation to a range of issues I am considering whether we can provide for the kind of voluntary guidance that was given in the case of martial arts equipment. A number of issues are involved that may require to be handled in that way, and I shall consider the hon. and learned Gentleman's point.

Mr. Dickens: Is my hon. Friend aware that the "Black Widow" is only the junior model and that the "Diablo" model, which is advertised in this week's "Shooting Times and Country" magazine, which is in the Library, is a killer which has a sight, an arm rest and pistol grip? The unrestricted sale of these weapons must be stopped or we shall present the police and ourselves with an enormous problem if we do not tackle this matter completely.

Mr. Shaw: I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety. He will know that a large range of similar devices are on sale which can be used safely under certain controlled conditions. What concerns my hon. Friend and the House is the wide availability of such items to those who will not use them under trained and careful conditions. It is that problem that I shall endeavour to deal with.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Minister aware that the "Black Widow" and the other catapult are made by Barnett International, which also manufactures crossbows, about which this House has expressed concern? For some strange reason the firm received the 1985 Queen's award for export and technology. Is there any innocent use to which these lethal catapults can be put? If not, ought there not to be some quick action by the Home Office on their sale?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. The company did indeed win the Queen's award for export, because 85 per cent. of its entire production goes overseas. In relation to domestic sale, the hon. Gentleman is equally correct that widespread abuse could occur from the use of these weapons. Equally, there are a number of clubs which make legitimate use of these weapons on private premises. What we have to do is to strike a balance of where we can take discriminate action as opposed to merely taking the view that everything which can be abused must be the subject of legislation preventing its sale. Otherwise, knives and scissors would be in the latter category.

Sunday Trading

3. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions for breaches of the Sunday trading laws have taken place since 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I regret that, as yet, the information is not centrally available. Responsibility for the enforcement of the law governing Sunday trading is a matter for the local authorities.

Mrs. Roe: The figures which have been presented to me are considerable and they highlight the fact that there is a need for reform. Would my hon. and learned Friend welcome an initiative to introduce partial deregulation for leisure retailing, especially for garden centres?

Mr. Tony Banks: He would rather be shot at with a "Black Widow".

Mr. Waddington: The Auld Committee thought that there was no sensible alternative to complete deregulation of shop hours. That remains the Government's view, but obviously we would have to form a view on any private Member's Bill which was introduced in the next Session.

Mr. Ashton: Why is it that when trade unionists break the law the Government crack down on them with a very heavy hand, but when employers break it and compel their workers to work on Sundays, without any extra pay and even advertise that they are opening on Sundays — for example do-it-yourself shops — the Government and local authorities take no notice?

Mr. Waddington: We are talking about the Shops Act 1950, and section 71 of that Act says that it is the duty of every local authority to enforce, within its district, the provisions of the Act. Enforcement is a matter for the local authorities; it is not a matter for the Government.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that if the Government are in difficulties over the Sunday trading laws they need only to adopt the Shops (No. 2) Bill, which is listed on today's Order Paper? The Bill would iron out all the anomalies as well as preserving Sunday as a special day. It would also command majority support in the House.

Mr. Waddington: I read my hon. Friend's Bill. It covers small shops with fewer than four employees and also, for four hours only, do-it-yourself shops, if a local authority makes an appropriate order. I cannot see how it possibly can be right to buy goods from a small shop but offensive, wrong and immoral to buy from a large shop. After what happened in the House not long ago, I am far from sure that there is anything like a consensus for the introduction of the sort of measures which my hon. Friend has in mind.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that, although his and the Government's attempt to reform the law failed because there was not general agreement on total deregulation, the Government are, none the less, under some obligation to see whether we rally round an ad hoc, piecemeal policy of reform?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend knows the history of this matter. On Second Reading of the Bill my right hon. Friend made it absolutely plain that the Government were prepared, during the Committee stage, to listen to any proposals for deregulation short of total deregulation. In spite of that, the majority of this House voted against the Bill on Second Reading. In those circumstances, it is unrealistic to expect the Government to introduce a Bill until there is clear evidence that a consensus for reform has emerged.

News International Dispute

4. Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the maximum number of police officers deployed at any one time on duties in connection with the News International industrial dispute, and the relationship which this number bears to the local number of Metropolitan police officers available for duty at the time in question.

Mr. Hurd: There were 1,870 officers deployed outside the News International plant at Wapping on 6 April. An additional 590 officers were involved in policing a march to Wapping. Information about the total number of officers available for duty that day could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Leighton: Is the Secretary of State aware that the effort of turning Wapping into a no-go area is denuding our hard-pressed constituencies of a police service? Will he explain why we cannot have an up-to-date estimate of the total cost of the Wapping operation? What is the result of the internal inquiry into police behaviour on 3 May, and what disciplinary action has been taken?

Mr. Hurd: Any complaints about the actions of the police on 3 May or on any other occasion at Wapping or elsewhere should be examined through the procedures which the House has laid down. I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman is aiming at. If he is saying that the police should not police events at Wapping, he is saying, in effect, that the plant there should be left open to attack and that people who want to work there should be prevented from doing so. I cannot think that he is really arguing that. The number of police officers who should be deployed at Wapping must be a matter for the judgment of the commissioner. Any hon. Member who believes in the operational independence of chief officers must support that.

Mr. Wheeler: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, whatever the merits of the argument about the industrial dispute at Wapping, there would be no need for such a massive police presence if the Opposition would call off their supporters and associates? Peace would be restored, and that would be in the interests of Londoners and crime prevention as a whole.

Mr. Hurd: I agree. The number of police officers now engaged at Wapping is lower than that which I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), because the hon. Gentleman asked for the maximum number deployed at any one time. The number is still high, and tactics have changed. Instead of having demonstrations on Wednesday and Saturday nights, several hundred people now arrive and start an operation at differing times of the day and week with no notice. This makes it difficult for the police to handle the situation and it weakens the policing effort in the rest of London. If those who are engaged in the dispute feel that they have to pursue it, I wish that they would discuss with the police ways of doing so, ways in which they could exercise their rights without weakening the police and, therefore, the effort that is being made to combat crime in the rest of London.

Mr. Mikardo: Is the Secretary of State aware that a couple of weeks ago in the same borough a half-mile march by about 200 women and 100 children was invigilated by a force of more than 40 police, most of whom inviligated it by sitting motionless in a coach, which proceeded to follow the tail of the procession very slowly, to the jeers of many onlookers? Is that an economic use of police manpower?

Mr. Hurd: I think that criticisms of the police are about evenly divided between those who say that they do too much and those who say they do too little. These are difficult operational decisions. In my view, and that of the occupants of the Opposition Front Bench, they can, because they are operational questions, be left only to the operational decision of the chief officer of police.

Dr. Michael Clark: Is my right hon. Friend aware that at 5.15 yesterday afternoon the East India Dock road was blocked by a mass of pickets using crowd barriers to form their obstruction? I was driving the first car to appear on the scene and I was able to escape by going over the pavement and down a side road, but all the cars behind me had to turn round and go back. When the Queen's highway is blocked in this way, is it not essential that police remain in the area to ensure free passage?

Mr. Hurd: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The police are acting to prevent breaches of the peace and obstruction of the highway. It is in the interests of citizens as a whole that they should maintain that activity. At Wapping, 346 police officers have been injured so far and there have been 1,098 arrests. I cannot think that the way in which the dispute is being conducted on the union side helps the unions' case or the cause of printers in any way. It certainly makes it more difficult for the Metropolitan police to fight crime in the rest of London.

Mr. Corbett: How can the Home Secretary acquiesce in the withdrawal of a substantial number of Metropolitan police officers from fighting and preventing crime on the streets of the capital without trying to exert pressure on Mr. Murdoch to open proper negotiations?

Mr. Hurd: I wish that the dispute could be settled. I have said so many times. If the Labour Front Bench is saying that the commissioner should let the situation at Wapping go unpoliced so that the plant can be attacked and the electricians and others working there can be prevented from entering, it should say so openly instead of making such guarded remarks.

Airborne Radiation

5. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation holds radiac equipment capable of measuring levels of radiation in the air; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes, Sir. The United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation holds fixed and portable radiation survey meters capable of measuring radiation doses in air.

Mr. Bowden: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer and the reassurance that he has given. Can he give us a further assurance that the equipment held by the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation is capable of properly measuring the levels of radiation after Chernobyl?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will be aware that there is a thorough examination of all aspects of that accident. As to the capacity of such meters to measure radiation dosage from Chernobyl, the answer is no, because the rated radiation was so low that it could not be measured by the meters that are used.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Are steps being taken to assist county civil defence officers in measuring emissions of radiation? Reports to my authority in the Isle of Wight depicted a scene whereby the local officer did not know how to answer questions by the general public.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. A number of details, both of communication and the type of radiation measurement that would be suitable for such an incident, are to be worked out in the post-Chernobyl examination.

Mr. Neil Thorne: In view of the natural public concern over unseen dangerous rays, will my hon. Frend consider following the lead taken by the Japanese in showing graphically precisely what levels are likely to occur by way of X-rays, from sun, from travelling by air, and from the kind of accident that took place in Chernobyl?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is quite right. There is a real difficulty in transmitting to the public the information in a form that would enable them to understand it. It is not easy, for example, that the scientific measurement of radiation rays has just changed from the basis of rems and rads to the basis of grays and centigrays. I shall consider the point that my hon. Friend has made as part of the review of all these issues in relation to the Chernobyl incident.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Banks.

Mr. Tony Banks: No. 5, Sir.

Hon. Members: No. 6.

Long Lartin Prison

6. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the Provisional Irish Republican Army are currently held in Her Majesty's prison Long Lartin; and how many are allowed private visits.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Office (Mr. David Mellor): The hon. Gentleman is more right than usual, Mr. Speaker.

There are 11 prisoners at Long Lartin who are regarded as members of the IRA. Private visits are not normally permitted for any prisoner.

Mr. Banks: I should be grateful if the Minister could answer this queston seriously without cheap and snide comments.

Will he confirm, or deny, that John Walker, who was one of those convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings, and who was described at his trial as a brigadier in the IRA, receives visits at Long Lartin alongside ordinary criminal prisoners? Is it not a fact that he does so, as do others convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings, because the Government and the prison authorities know that a great miscarriage of justice has taken place? When does the Minister intend to announce an inquiry into that trial and the convictions?

Mr. Mellor: What the hon. Gentleman says about visiting arrangements is right. The assumption that he seeks to draw from it is wrong. My right hon. Friend is considering whether there should be any reference to the Court of Appeal of the convictions in those cases, having regard to further submissions which have been made and which are under active consideration.

Mr. Benn: Is the Minister aware that in the book "Error of Judgment" recently written by Mr. Chris Mullin, there is incontrovertible evidence that undermines, quite clinically, the prosecution evidence against the six men, undoubted evidence of maltreatment of the prisoners before they went to court, and a clear indication as to who else committed that bombing? There is a widespread view among people who have no interest, other than that justice should be done, that the matter should be properly examined. There is a widespread belief that six innocent people have been imprisoned for 10 years for an offence they did not commit.

Mr. Mellor: I note the right hon. Gentleman's confident assertion, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will give it such weight as he thinks appropriate in making his difficult decision.

Mr. Duffy: It is nearly a year since the Home Secretary ordered a Home Office investigation, following the Granada programme on the Birmingham six, and since the Taoiseach, Dr. FitzGerald, said that the case was being dealt with "very urgently". What evidence do we have that the Home Secretary has demonstrated any urgency in recent months on this case?

Mr. Mellor: The case is being thoroughly investigated. The hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) should get together to be clear about what they are saying before they start putting different questions to us. The book upon which the right hon. Member for Chesterfield relies was published only three weeks ago, and that matter is being looked at. These are difficult decisions with which not only this Home Secretary but previous Home Secretaries have had to grapple. I see that the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) confirms that. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) would do the subject a little more credit if he recognised how difficult these matters are and how carefully they need to be explored.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: The Under-Secretary of State is correct to say that they are difficult decisions to take. Whatever else, doubts are cast on the decisions taken in that case. Given those doubts—I say no more than that—what procedures must now be followed? I think that if those procedures were understood some of the concern would be quietened.

Mr. Mellor: As ever the right hon. Gentleman is most helpful and I will tell him. The matters under investigation relate to a wide range of pieces of evidence canvassed at the trial. Much of that work is at an advanced stage. The publication of the book by Chris Mullin raised fresh points, especially the contention that certain individuals — allegedly known to Mullin, although not named, thereby making our position rather difficult — have committed these offences. As a result, the West Midlands police were asked to carry out further investigations. When the results are to hand, they will be consolidated with the other material. When the examination is completed, an announcement will be made. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has no interest in prolonging these matters, nor does he believe that pressure of the type which one or two hon. Members — not the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South — are seeking to exert is at all helpful in arriving at the objective quasi-judicial decision which my right hon. Friend much reach before deciding whether the matter should be referred to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Soley: Does the Minister accept that the House faces an extremely difficult decision? There is considerable anxiety on both sides of the House, in the House of Lords and in the country generally, that the convictions in the Birmingham pub bombing case, and in the Guildford and Maguire cases may be wrongful convictions. If so, not only are innocent people in prison, but guilty people are still free, with all that that implies for offences of this type. In view of that, and of the fact that no hon. Member or person outside the House can have any interest in seeing innocent people in prison and guilty people going free, will the hon. Gentleman consider ordering a retrial in all three cases?

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is charged with the responsibility of deciding whether there are matters capable of being regarded as fresh evidence of a kind which, under examination by the Court of Appeal, might cast doubt on a jury's findings in this or any other case. That is always a difficult issue, especially in a case such as the Birmingham bombing case, which has been considered frequently by appellate courts in the context of civil and criminal proceedings. My right hon. Friend will discharge his duties in this respect with as much care as possible. That is the proper basis on which it will be done.

I assure the House that no one has any interest in prolonging these matters. We recognise that there is a double public interest in this — in ensuring that people are not wrongly convicted and, equally, in ensuring that, if people are rightly convicted, orchestrated campaigns should not undermine the integrity of those convictions.

Civil Protection (Local Authorities)

8. Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he proposes to take to ensure that local authorities implement their all hazards responsibilities in relation to civil protection.

10. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to bring to the attention of local authorities the all hazards aspect of civil protection.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As I announced on 22 July in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki), new guidance on the preparation of plans and on the all hazards approach has been sent to local authority associations with our proposals for a planned programme for implementation of the 1983 civil defence regulations.

Mr. Rathbone: I welcomed my hon. Friend's answer on that day. It is indicative of the humanitarian desire and social obligations of national Government and most local governments to meet those ends. However, could he reassure the House that at borough council, district council and town council level those plans will be carried through?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will be aware that the prime responsibility rests with those authorities which carry civil defence responsibility, mainly the county councils, but also the joint boards for fire and civil defence. I can assure him that it will be a requirement upon the counties that the plans they produce to conform with the 1983 regulations must show that they have a countywide network of communications and monitoring. That will include districts as well.

Mr. Leigh: Does my hon. Friend agree that, whatever one's views on the desirability or otherwise of the possession of nuclear weapons, any country must have plans for adequate protection for the civil population against disaster, whether natural or man-made, native or imported? In that respect, opposition to civil defence on narrow unilateralist grounds puts at risk the wider concept of civil protection against all hazards.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is correct. Civil defence is a form of humanitarian protection for the civil population and it is essential that local authorities should realise that that is what they are denying their electorate in many cases. The widespread response we had on the review undertaken last year shows that many local authorities have failed to provide adequate plans for protection. We are determined to correct that.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister confirm that he is aware that on Saturday 28 June an oleum tank at a chemical company in St. Helens split and released a cloud of sulphur trioxide over St. Helens and the police had to put into effect Operation Cloudburst? Is he aware that the local authority had no input into Operation Cloudburst? Does that not make nonsense of the statement he made the other day?

Mr. Shaw: If the local authority had an effective civil protection system under its emergency planning officers, there would be consultation between the police and the civil protection authority on that matter. As for Operation Cloudburst, it was quick action by the police that prevented any real disturbance as a result of that incident.

Mr. Skinner: How on earth can the Minister argue that local authorities can provide civil protection in case of a nuclear attack when, only a few months ago, as a result of one nuclear reactor going up in Chernobyl, there was enormous emission of radioactivity affecting not only this country but the Western world, and resulting in hysteria, not only on the continent, but in Britain? In view of that hysteria and the hundred times greater damage that could result from a nuclear attack, how can civil protection be provided?

Mr. Shaw: I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman had now totally destroyed the concept of a nuclear-free zone. It is absurd to think that any local authority or population can protect itself against the possibility of radiation unless it has a fully worked out plan for civil protection.

Mr. John Browne: Will my hon. Friend accept that the county of Hampshire has a greatly increasing population and, therefore, a greatly increasing civil defence problem? Will he further accept that the chief constable and the chairman of the police council, Councillor Michael Boyle, are extremely prudent men? Is he aware that both those men are applying for a significant increase in the establishment of the police in Hampshire, which does not seem to be coming through his Department? Will he look into that question urgently and meet the legitimate demands of those police authorities?

Mr. Shaw: I am well aware of the application, which was originally for 33 posts and now is for 28 posts for Hampshire. It will be given urgent consideration in the light of my right hon. Friend's decision to ensure that all police authorities should have any proposed increases analysed for proven need. We hope to arrive at a decision shortly.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Bearing in mind that civil defence in respect of hostile attack is subject to statutory control, does the Minister agree that it would be much better to put the all hazards approach on a statutory basis? Does he further agree that we shall never have an even-handed approach to civil defence unless we have statutory control on an all hazards basis and requirements laid down by central Government?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that we have made some progress with the small amending Bill to the Civil Defence Act 1948 which was piloted through the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminister (Sir N. Bonsor). In addition, the 1983 regulations are statutory. If the plans which we now require are brought under those regulations, they will have all the statutory force required to provide the civil protection cover that the hon. and learned Gentleman seeks.

Peacock Report

9. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received since publication of the Peacock Report.

11. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the Peacock report.

Mr. Hurd: We have received a small number of letters from hon. Members and from the public about specific matters raised in the report.

Mr. Thompson: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Bearing in mind the increasing burden of the licence fee on many ordinary people, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be wrong to tie the BBC licence fee to the retail prices index, as suggested by the Peacock committee? Should it not be tied to some RPI minus X formula, leading, I hope, to a reduction in the licence fee and a concentration of the BBC's mind on priorities, efficiency and quality?

Mr. Hurd: That is an interesting variation on the recommendation in the Peacock report. We are considering, and must consider, if we are to live with the licence fee as a system for some time, how we can ensure that citizens are protected from excessive increases and that the BBC has the same sort of pressures on it for efficiency as are common throughout the public sector.

Mr. McKay: Does the Home Secretary accept that the Peacock report has endorsed the view of Parliament regarding concessionary television licences for old people? Will he now take the opportunity of the next Queen's Speech to announce that concessionary television licences will be adopted? This is probably his last chance before an incoming Labour Government will do so.

Mr. Hurd: I recommend as holiday reading to the hon. Gentleman the Peacock report, which went out of its way to demolish the Labour party's proposition.

Mr. Soames: Has my right hon. Friend seen the representations from my constituents on the Peacock report, particularly those connected with the disgraceful reporting by the BBC of the position in South Africa? What steps will he take to ensure that a political balance is restored to the BBC?

Mr. Hurd: The responsibility for ensuring that the BBC treats controversial subjects with due impartiality rests with the board of governors of the BBC and is enshrined in its resolution of 8 January 1981, which is an annex to the BBC's licence and agreement. Parliament has given the board of governors of the BBC, not the Home Secretary or any Minister, this extremely important responsibility and it is up to the board to make arrangements to ensure that that responsibility is discharged.

Civil Defence

12. Mrs. Shields asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated expenditure by district councils on civil defence in 1986; what proportion will be provided by central Government resources; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: District councils' civil defence expenditure is incorporated in county councils' estimates and the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The total of local authority estimates for civil defence expenditure in the current financial year is £19,494 million. Civil defence grant is paid on approved expenditure at the rates of 75 per cent. or 100 per cent., depending on the nature of the activity.

Mrs. Shields: Will the Minister make available a 100 per cent. grant for the provision of control centres?

Mr. Shaw: As the hon. Lady will know, that is at present the case for the construction of control centres. We are considering whether the 100 per cent. grant should be available for a wider range of expenditure, including staff costs.

BBC News Broadcasts

13. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to monitor political balance in BBC news broadcasts.

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir. It is for the board of governors of the corporation, as I have just said, to ensure that BBC programmes are presented with due impartiality.

Mr. Chope: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied with the performance of the governors of the BBC in carrying out their responsibilities? Why can we not have the same straightforward newspaper reporting on BBC television as we enjoy when we listen to the BBC World Service?

Mr. Hurd: That is the responsibility of the board of governors. I think it is entirely legitimate and, indeed, desirable, that citizens or organisations who feel themselves aggrieved or feel, as my hon. Friend evidently does, that standards have slipped in this regard should take every opportunity to make their views known direct to the governors. It is part of the responsibility of the governors to pay attention to that.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

14. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why it has not yet been possible to conclude the review of the convictions of six men for the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Hurd: I have been concerned to examine thoroughly the material submitted to me following the World in Action television programme. In addition, as my hon. Friend said a few minutes ago, I am now considering points raised in the recently published book on the case.

Ms. Short: It does not make anyone in Birmingham feel any better about the Birmingham bombings to know that six innocent men have now been locked up for 12 years. Can the Home Secretary tell us when he is likely to reach a conclusion? Can he also tell us whether it is true that the Home Office repeated the forensic tests and found that the tests that were used were totally unreliable?

Mr. Hurd: I am not going to deal bit by bit with the particular aspects of this complicated matter. The hon. Lady would not seriously expect me to do that. When suggestions are made that there is new evidence, as has happened recently with Mr. Mullin's book, it must be right, if I am to make a serious judgment, a serious decision, in the matter, that I should take those new arguments into consideration. That is what is now happening. I have no desire or interest in delaying a decision on that. It is a very difficult decision now, as it has always been. The criteria have been well established under the different holders of my office, and I shall seek to apply those criteria to the best of my ability.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Agricultural Spending)

Q1. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise, at the next meeting of the Council of Ministers, the issues raised by the monthly reports submitted to the Council by the Commission on trends in agricultural spending in accordance with the 4 December 1984 agreement.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): The Commission has produced these reports partly in response to my hon. Friend's persistent questioning. The issues raised by these reports have been considered by the Budget Council in its discussions on the 1986 budget.

Mr. Taylor: As the 1·4 VAT rate, which was meant to last for several years, has now been fully budgeted this year, and as the Council has clearly abandoned any attempt to control agricultural spending, can the Prime Minister now give some indication to British farmers, to the Third world countries that are savaged by Common Market dumping, and to the Soviet Union, which benefits hugely from Common Market dumping, as to what will happen when, almost inevitably later this year, the Common Market is bankrupt once again and runs out of funds?

The Prime Minister: The revised Community budget for 1986 has now been adopted and this replaces the budget ruled illegal by the European Court of Justice. We believe that the new, revised budget makes adequate provision to meet all the Community's agricultural obligations. We do not expect any significant overrun into 1987. I must say that I agree with some of my hon. Friend's strictures on the effect of dumping surpluses on other countries.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Prime Minister aware that at Whitwell in my constituency the Coal Board has just closed a pit even though it has made a profit — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about the EEC.

Mr. Skinner: Yes—even though it made a profit for the greater part of the 100 years that it was open. The Common Market has been bankrupt for about five years out of the last 10——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about agricultural spending, in the EEC.

Mr. Skinner: Yes. The Common Market has been bankrupt for about five years out of the last 10 and, if it had been a coal mine, this Prime Minister would have shut it. Why does she not get on with it and save the British taxpayer some money for a change?

The Prime Minister: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that the taxpayer this year, in spite of the closing of a number of pits, will still pay something like £1·5 billion for the coal industry. With regard to the common agricultural policy, this year's price fixing was estimated to reduce spending by 320 million ecu in 1986 and 457 million ecu in 1987. Community financing of intervention was also cut, saving the budget 350 million ecu a year, so we are in fact steadily dealing with the problems of the common agricultural policy, in the same way as we are dealing steadily with the coal industry.

Several Hon. Members rose

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a definitive question, a rare occasion for Prime Minister's Questions. We must stick to the subject.

Mr. Ralph Howell: May I refer to the approach that has been made to my right hon. Friend by Sir Henry Plumb, the leader of the European Conservative parliamentary group, asking her to call a world food conference on the twin problems of embarrassing food surpluses in the Western world and starvation in the less developed countries? Will she give the House an assurance that she will take the lead and call urgently a food conference in London at the earliest possible moment?

The Prime Minister: The question of surpluses between the major producing countries was, as my hon. Friend knows, discussed at the Tokyo summit. We are in touch and in close consultation with the United States about those matters. We also agreed there that the proper forum for it to be discussed was in the new GATT round, which we are hoping will began in September. That should, and indeed must, include the whole question of agricultural surpluses and how to deal with them.

Engagements

Q2. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Does the Prime Minister agree that today's Westland report does not live up to the juicy leaks and well-trailed publicity? Will my right hon. Friend not spend too much time on it on this busy day?

The Prime Minister: The Government will, of course, respond to these reports in due course, but I should like to make two things clear straight away. First, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have total confidence in our officials referred to in the report. As the House will be aware, those responsible for decisions and disciplinary action have already concluded that there is no case for such action. Secondly, I do not accept the Committee's comments on the role of the head of the Home Civil Service. He continues to enjoy the Government's total confidence. He is a very distinguished public servant, who has performed great service to Governments of both parties.

Mr. Kinnock: The members of the Select Committee on Defence, of all parties, have been fastidious in their report on Westland plc. In that report, published today, they raise the most profound questions about the conduct of senior officials serving the Government, describing their conduct as "improper" and "disreputable". As head of that Government, does the Prime Minister accept ministerial responsibility for those officials, particularly as some of those named are directly accountable only to her and are personally associated very closely with her?

The Prime Minister: I have already answered the right hon. Gentleman's question before he asked it. The Government will, of course, respond beyond that to those reports in due course. At present I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Kinnock: This is not a usual Select Committee. All of us obviously understand that the Government will require time to compile their full response in the normal fashion, but there is one question to which the Prime Minister can and I believe the country also thinks this must given an answer now in a direct fashion. It is: will she accept the direct ministerial responsibility for officials that everyone understands goes with the office of Minister at every level, or will she be part of a cover-up?

The Prime Minister: I have already answered the right hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have total confidence in our officials referred to in the report. Secondly, I do not accept the Committee's comments on the role of the head of the Home Civil Service. He continues to enjoy the Government's total confidence. He is a very distinguished public servant who has performed great service to Governments of both parties.

Mr. Kinnock: By her repetitive replies and her failure to respond to the one issue upon which she can definitely respond today, it is difficult to escape the feeling that the Prime Minister is seeking to hide behind officials. If that is the case, is the Prime Minister aware that she is in great danger of herself attracting the reputation of being disreputable and improper?

The Prime Minister: No, but clearly the right hon. Gentleman asked that question because that was what he wanted to say at the end. The fact was that I volunteered the two points properly that we have total confidence in our officials, and we are proud to be able to stand up for them at this Dispatch Box.

Mr. Lyell: With the approach of the holidays, will my right hon. Friend congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on expelling another minor official from the Labour party, but will she agree with me——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with the Prime Minister's responsibilities.

Q3. Mr. Litherland asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Litherland: I refer the Prime Minister to paragraph 160 of the report of the Select Committee on Defence. It says:

"Since the information was passed by telephone to Westland in any event, the reason given by the Prime Minister for releasing the information to the Press Association begins to look flimsy, to say the least."

Will she now say what will happen to those five senior officials, because the buck stops here?

The Prime Minister: I have already answered the hon. Gentleman's question before he asked it. Beyond that, as I said earlier, the Government will of course respond to these reports in due course. I have nothing further to add this afternoon.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the statement that the Commonwealth is more important than the issues that temporarily divide it?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I believe firmly in the Commonwealth and I am sure that it is strong enough to withstand any differences between us in the future, as it has withstood them in the past.

Mr. Cartwright: Will the Prime Minister tell the House clearly whether she accepts or rejects the unanimous finding of the Select Committee on Defence that two key officials in her Department, Mr. Ingham and Mr. Powell, were deeply involved in the planned leaking of the Solicitor-General's letter, yet apparently failed to tell her what was going on? If that is so, how can the Prime Minister continue to express confidence in the officials concerned?

The Prime Minister: I have answered the points about my officials, but let me answer them again. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have total confidence in our officials referred to in the report. As the House will be aware, those responsible for decisions on disciplinary action have already concluded that there is no case for such action. Secondly, I do not accept the Committee's comments on the role of the head of the Home Civil Service. He continues to enjoy the Government's total confidence, and I am glad to express our confidence in his distinguished service.

Sir Anthony Grant: Does my right hon. Friend recall that the appalling Soweto uprising in South Africa occurred when there was a Labour Government here and that, at that time, apartheid was in its full, rigorous force, but, nevertheless, under the Labour Government, no fewer than 75 trade missions were sent to South Africa to encourage trade, at a cost to the taxpayer of more than £410,000? Have we not heard enough humbug from the Opposition on South Africa?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir. I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend.

Q4. Mr. Snape asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Snape: Does the Prime Minister agree that Mr. Bernard Ingham is normally very good at telling the rest of the world what is going on, and yet we are expected to believe that on this occasion he did not even tell the Prime Minister what was going on? Will she now answer the question, because it is her reputation that is directly under threat?

The Prime Minister: I have already indicated that the Government will be replying in due course. I have nothing further to add this afternoon. I am delighted that on this occasion, the last day when I am answering questions, the Opposition appear to be satisfied with health, education, social security, the welfare state—[Interruption.]—and between them they cannot muster a single question. My goodness, they are ready to go away!

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take it after the private notice question.

India (Drug Liaison Officers)

3.33 pm

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): I beg to ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to answer the question of which I have given him private notice.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): As I told the House on 22 July —

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the point of order after the private notice question.

Mr. Gow rose —

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have said that I shall take points of order after the private notice question. The hon. Gentleman must resume his seat.

Mr. Gow: My hon. and learned Friend has not read out the question.

Mr. Speaker: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. Will the hon. and learned Member for Fylde read his question?

Sir Edward Gardner: Perhaps I may acquaint the House of the question of which I have given private notice: what action is being taken to deal with the refusal by the Government of India to allow the posting of two British drug liaison officers to New Delhi and Bombay?

Mr. Tim Eggar: As I told the House on 22 July, the Government of India have told us that the posting of drug liaison officers should not proceed without their written consent despite their earlier agreement in principle. We have taken this up with the Government of India at the highest level. Most recently, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sent a message to Mr. Gandhi. We hope that he will reply in terms which give the Government of India's agreement that the postings should go ahead.

Sir Edward Gardner: Is my hon. Friend aware that large supplies of hard drugs are now passing through India on their way to Britain, and that, without adequate intelligence, which British drug liaison officers could provide, our attempts to stem the flow of this terrible traffic are bound to be seriously impeded? Is it not scandalous and wholly irresponsible of the Indian Government to aid and abet drug traffickers by denying us the means of identifying them and their activities? Last month the Indian Government said that they would allow those officers to be posted. Now they are refusing that posting. What on earth is going on?

Mr. Eggar: I share my hon. and learned Friend's concern about the recent developments, which we regard with great seriousness, not least because we estimate that in the first few months of this year 80 per cent. of heroin that has come into the United Kingdom has come from India. Last year the total amounts of heroin seized that had come via India had a street value of some £53 million. The only people who can possibly benefit from the latest development are the drug traffickers and the only people who will suffer are the drug addicts, both here and in India.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The Minister has our wholehearted support in his attempt to put drug enforcement officers in place in India. What reasons have the Indian Government given for their refusal, and are there any precedents for this action?

Mr. Eggar: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks. As he knows, we have seven drug liaison officers in different countries throughout the world and in no other country have we had anything like the same difficulties or complications in posting them.

The situation in India perplexes us. The Indian Government gave us a written undertaking which enabled my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to tell the Select Committee on Home Affairs that the drug liaison officers were to be posted, subject to certain details. We are not clear about the exact reason for the further delays.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Are we not constantly getting lectures on moral matters from the Indian Government and are not the Indian Government the biggest humbugs that we know about? I shall excuse my hon. Friend from answering that question.

Mr. Eggar: I note the point that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the Minister first repudiate the obnoxious, unnecessary and contemptible attack on India's Government that has just been made? Knowing, as he well does, that I have been concerned that drug liaison officers should be installed in India, will he please answer the question that he has already been asked as to why India is refusing, and, in particular, whether it is because, on the basis of reciprocity, they are asking for information and help regarding smuggling which Her Majesty's Government are refusing to give?

Mr. Eggar: I recognise the part that the hon. and learned Gentleman, with others in the House, has played in trying to persuade the Indian Government to agree to the posting of British DLOs in India.

On 24 June the Indians asked us not to send our officers until agreement was reached on unrelated issues about co-operation between the United Kingdom and the Indian revenue authorities. That point was raised by the Indian Government. We responded immediately and said that we would give our full co-operation within our powers under the law. In other words, we would do everything that we could legally do to assist the Indian Government. That assurance appears not to have been accepted so far.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Despite the South African matter, is not the world drugs menace something to which the Commonwealth Heads of Government might turn their attention? Without attacking the Government of India at this moment, should not this be brought before other partner Governments and perhaps Sir "Sonny" Ramphal could do something about it?

Mr. Eggar: I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's points are drawn to the attention of the Commonwealth Secretary-General. The fight against drugs is worldwide. Every country has a major part to play in that fight and that is why we are so distressed at the stance taken by the Government of India.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Does the Minister appreciate that the excellent resolution passed by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in Ottawa last year received the assent of all Commonwealth countries and instructed Governments to improve their position? Is he aware that, although heroin is a terrible drug, the greatest growth in imports is in cocaine? Rather than trying to give off-the-cuff answers to the House, he should have much closer relations with Dr. Alexander, the High Commissioner at India house, in Aldwych.

Mr. Eggar: I recognise the role that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members played in the fight against drugs and we are all grateful for that. He spoke about cocaine. The largest threat at present is from heroin and, as I have said, we believe that some 80 per cent. of heroin comes through from India. The hon. Gentleman also spoke about contacts with His Excellency the Indian High Commissioner. I saw His Excellency on Saturday 28 June and on Friday 11 July to discuss this issue. In the past year there have been 30 or more contacts at either ministerial or senior official level on the question of sending drugs liaison officers to India.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Does my hon. Friend appreciate that the House will be extremely disturbed by the news about the lack of co-operation by the Indian Government in this small effort to control the international trade in drugs? Can he reassure the House that he has had talks with the Indian High Commissioner in London since the decision by the Indian Government was taken and that the Prime Minister has been in contact with the Prime Minister of India since that time? Can he also reassure the House, as my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) has suggested, that the subject will feature on the agenda for discussion by the Commonwealth leaders when they next meet?

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sent a message to Mr. Gandhi and we are still waiting for a response to it. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary felt it right to inform the Select Committee on Home Affairs before the House rose about the difficulties we are encountering. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others will take the opportunity on Mr. Gandhi's visit to London in August to raise this question with him.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): We all hope that the Indian Government will co-operate in these matters, but does the Minister accept that his own Government's record might have been more impressive if they had not considerably reduced the number of customs officers since 1979? Can the Minister explain the deterioration in relations not just with the Government of India but with almost every Commonwealth country, especially in recent weeks?

Mr. Eggar: In reply to the implied point made by the hon. Gentleman, I have to tell him that there is no indication from the Indian Government that there is any connection between developments in the Commonwealth and this issue. We certainly do not see any such connection. There are two officers from the Indian customs service in London, and they receive different forms of co-operation from the Government.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my hon. Friend recall that some members of the Select Committee on Home Affairs visited the Indian sub-continent last November, and that alone among the three countries the Government of India declined to receive them? The Governments of Pakistan and Bangladesh co-operate fully with the United Kingdom to suppress this odious drug trafficking trade. Will he again urge upon the Government of India the necessity to rejoin the humanitarian members of the Commonwealth and other countries in doing something about this problem?

Mr. Eggar: Because we believe that this is a worldwide fight, during the past year we have often been in close touch with the Indian Government. We shall certainly draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of the Indian High Commissioner.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Will the Minister dare to repudiate some of the interventions from senior Back Benchers who should know better and whose remarks seemed designed to sour a delicate situation? Is he aware of the helpful visit to India by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in May this year when there was every sign that the matter would be resolved speedily? Is he further aware that we share my right hon. Friend's puzzlement and his desire to get things moving?

What in the Minister's view is the new factor which has intervened since May? Is it the sikhs in Khalistan, although that problem was apparent in May? Is it something to do with sanctions and South Africa? What is the key factor? Will the Minister seek to clarify with the Indian Government the precise reason why they are now delaying? Will he make it clear to them that hon. Members on both sides of the House want progress to be made in ending this vile drug trade and that the only people who can benefit from further delays are the drug barons?

Mr. Eggar: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and I particularly welcome the support that he and the Leader of the Opposition have given to our efforts to post drugs liaison officers in India. Of course, I cannot speak for my right hon. and hon. Friends or for their views, but we seek to ensure that our relations with India are good and excellent. Obviously, one must take into account the fact that right hon. and hon. Members and people outside the House feel very strongly about the drugs liaison officers issue. It is bound to have an effect on the way in which Her Majesty's Government's relations with India are viewed.

Points of Order

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a House of Commons point, not a party point. During Prime Minister's Question Time the Prime Minister used the words "in due course" four times. Why cannot "in due course" be tomorrow morning between 10.15 am and 11 am during an Adjournment debate? Why should some hapless junior Minister be sent along to defend the Cabinet Secretary and Mr. Ingham? Is there not a unique case for the Prime Minister herself to come to the House and not to let the matter fester? Surely she should come to the House and answer the questions which have been properly put.

Mr. Speaker: Whoever speaks for the Front Bench on either side is not a matter for the Chair.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are three statements and business questions this afternoon, followed by private

[Mr. Speaker]

Members' debates. I shall take another point of order, although if it is on the same point it is a matter not of order but of argument.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I am seeking not to argue with you, Mr. Speaker, but to raise a point of order. Only the Chair can answer the point of order. Surely it is unfair if, after promising to co-operate with the inquiry, the Prime Minister forbids civil servants to give evidence to it, and if a junior Minister is asked to shuffle off excuses and to take the blame for what the Prime Minister said — [Interruption.] The democrats on the Government Benches want the issue to be quietened down, but they will not quieten me in a hurry. There has been an attempt at a cover up. We have nowhere else to go but to you, Mr. Speaker, to ask that the matter be debated properly. The right place for that debate is in the House, and the right time is tomorrow morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot help. Hon. Members know that who speaks from the Front Bench is not a matter for me. By great good fortune, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) drew a place in the ballot for the Adjournment debates tomorrow. The whole House will be interested to hear him, and some hon. Members might even be able to take part in the debate.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise out of questions?

Mr. Madden: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take no further points of order on the matter raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow.

Mr. Madden: This is a matter that could directly affect you, Mr. Speaker, and all other Members of Parliament during the recess. I have received information today that immigration officers at Heathrow are balloting to take action as from August bank holiday, the effect of which would be to bring Heathrow to a standstill. Thousands upon thousands of people arriving in this country would be subjected to very long delays in order to receive permission to enter the country. The immigration officers are balloting because of their anger and exasperation at the conditions in which they are working, which is a direct result of understaffing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman can best raise that matter on the motion for the summer Adjournment. If what he says is correct, clearly we should not adjourn tomorrow and, indeed, should sit until this matter has been resolved.

Business of the House

3.50 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May we have the business for the week beginning 21 August — [HON. MEMBERS: "October."]

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I think that the right hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm exceeds his expectations. The business for the first week after the summer Adjournment will be as follows:

TUESDAY 21 OCTOBER—Conclusion of the remaining stages of the Education Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 22 OCTOBER—Progress on remaining stages of the Sex Discrimination Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 23 OCTOBER — Until seven o'clock completion of remaining stages of the Sex Discrimination Bill [Lords].

Remaining stages of the Salmon Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 24 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Public Trustee and Administration of Funds Bill [Lords].

Proceedings on the Family Law Bill [Lords] and the Parliamentary Constituencies Bill [Lords] which is a consolidation measure.

Motions on Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) Orders.

Motion on the Second International Fund for Agricultural Development (Second Replenishment) Order.

The House may also be asked to consider any other Lords amendments and messages which may be received. It may be for the convenience of the House if I indicate that Government business will also be taken in the two following weeks. It is expected that the new Session will be opened on Wednesday 12 November.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, in view of the impending recess, he is now able to make an immediate statement on the investigations into the Deputy Chief Constable of Manchester, Mr. Stalker, as it would be in our universal interest to have a clear indication of the Government's view on this matter?

Today the Government are rushing through the statements on the royal ordnance factories and on Unipart and Leyland Bus. We have asked for statements on those subjects for the last month, but now there will be no time for a proper debate in Government time on these critical issues before Parliament rises. Is that satisfactory for the thousands of people who are anxious about the future of both the ROFs and the Leyland enterprise?

The report of the Select Committee on Defence on the Westland affair is obviously a matter of considerable importance. Last week the Leader of the House responded to my request for a debate on the report in this Session by saying that it was a "reasonable request". Is he now satisfied with the arrangements for the first week back, which plainly exclude any debate on that Select Committee report? Will he even now reflect on the matter and change the business for the first week back so that we may discuss the report.

I also note that in the first week back no time has been allocated for a debate on southern Africa. That is peculiar, especially when in the intervening period during August and September there will have been at least one meeting of Commonwealth Heads of Government and at least one meeting of the European Council specifically to discuss that matter and the initiatives arising from their previous deliberations. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us an assurance that this is another matter which he will reconsider so that we may debate the issue of South and southern Africa in the early days when we return after the Adjournment of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I will take those points in the order in which they were presented by the right hon. Gentleman.

I quite understand why there is anxiety that the so-called Stalker report should be made available. The right hon. Gentleman will understand that it would be inappropriate for the Government to do that until inquiries are concluded. I am sure that he will join with many others in the House and with the early-day motion which wishes a speedy conclusion to the inquiries which will then permit the publication of the report. I will, of course, refer his specific request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

I think that the whole House will acknowledge that it is helpful for the employees concerned that statements should be made today in respect of the royal ordnance factories and British Leyland. I believe that that would have the general consent of the House.

With regard to a debate upon the Westland report, the right hon. Gentleman referred to our exchange on this topic last week. Of course, I take note of his request that the matter should be debated fairly early in the overspill, but I believe that the timing of such a debate would properly be a matter for the usual channels and perhaps it could be proceeded with in that manner.

Similarly, I take note of the right hon. Gentleman's concern about southern Africa, but I am sure that its topicality will not have diminished during our absence. Again, this is something which can be looked at through the usual channels.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Has my right hon. Friend noticed early-day motion 1067 relating to advice on technology to parliamentarians which has already been signed by 93 hon. Members?

[That this House, while recognising the support and assistance granted to the United States Congress and Senate during the past thirteen years by the Office of Technology Assessment, acknowledging that a similar approach is currently being considered for establishment in France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Austria and Australia to obtain well-informed and objective assessment, and in considering the rapid growth of technology in the past decade and its impact on economic development, health, environment and so forth, feels that where the need arises that there should be a body at Westminster to advise Parliamentarians of both Houses upon the implications and impact of scientific innovation, the identification of commercially exploitable areas of science, the correct evaluation of conflicting technical data, the collation of information secured from abroad, and the rational use of national resources; and urges the House of Commons Commission or relevant authority to establish a body within the precincts of Westminster to research, prepare reports and advise Parliamentarians on scientific matters independently of the executive, while at all times subscribing to three crucial elements, namely, that it will accord with British Parliamentary traditions, be funded in part by the House of Commons Commission, and evolve out of the existing structure of the Parliamentary and Scientific Committee.]

I wonder whether my right hon. Friend can provide an early date to discuss this matter, as it is vital to the House.

Mr. Biffen: I have taken note of the early-day motion to which my hon. Friend has referred. It might be a suitable matter to be raised through an Adjournment debate rather than in Government time.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Does the right hon. Gentleman think it is proper that the House should depart for the summer recess without having the opportunity to debate the Westland report? Does he not think it is extremely serious that the House should not discuss such major charges against the head of the Civil Service? Does he not consider that, if he does not provide time for a debate, he will be a party to the collusion between the Prime Minister and the head of the Civil Service—and collusion means guilty association?

Mr. Biffen: No. The right hon. Gentleman has a long and distinguished career in the House and he should not mar it by becoming a rather low-grade McCarthyite by implying collusion in this matter. The report, which came out today, deserves proper and measured consideration. As I suggested to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, I believe that that can take place in the overspill. If the right hon. Gentleman takes a contrary view, he can, of course, vote against the recess motion.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Regarding the innocence of the late Giuseppe Conlon and the Maguires, will my right hon. Friend invite the Home Secretary to take counsel with his advisers during the recess and, instead of leaving it to Back Benchers, find a way whereby either there can be a new trial or a Queen's pardon can be recommended?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure what status or authority I would have in this matter, but I shall take account of what my hon. Friend says and refer his remarks to those of my right hon. Friends who are approached.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Is the Leader of the House aware that another report which concerns many Members with constituency interests in Plessey is that of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which is presently on the desk of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? It happens to relate especially to the Plessey work force in my constituency. If a statement cannot be made in the House this week, may a statement be made in the other place next week?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly my responsibilities do not run up the road. No statement can be made until the report has been made available and is ready for publication. I shall consider the matter, especially in respect of the facilities that might be offered by the other place.

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House tell my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the strong feelings held in all quarters that war service should count for the pension calculation of civil servants, as is evidenced by early-day motion 254, which has been signed, following the lead of my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), by well over 250 Members?

[Sir Edward du Cann]

[That this House believes that overseas Civil Service pensioners should be allowed to count war service towards their pension entitlement in the same way as every other branch of the public service; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to do justice towards a small number of mostly elderly people whose working lives were spent abroad in the service of the Crown.]

Is my right hon. Friend aware that a mere 4,600 people are affected? Every year there are fewer. This House surely should give them justice.

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend puts with great eloquence the point which hitherto has been argued forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): The Leader of the House will no doubt recall that two weeks ago, after the welcome vindication of Mrs. Wendy Savage, I asked the Prime Minister whether she would take on board the matter and discuss it with the Secretary of State for Social Services with a view to having an inquiry into the competence of those who were her major accusers, especially as one of those gentlemen does virtually no National Health Service work with NHS patients, although he is working in an NHS hospital. Most of his time is spent dealing with private patients at £400 a time. Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that it is about time that we had an inquiry?

Mr. Biffen: The judgment whether we should have an inquiry more properly belongs to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mrs. Short: The Prime Minister said that she would speak to the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer the request to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. Friend read early-day motion 1120, which is headed "Compensation for Whistleblowers". It has been signed by 250 Members on both sides of the House.

[That this House positively supports paragraphs 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 of the Twenty-third Report of the Public Accounts Committee entitled Production Costs of Defence Equipment, on the subject of Post Costing of Contracts with Aish and Company; supports in particular paragraphs (x) and (xi) in the Report's recommendations which state:

'(x) We note that MoD officials responsible for contracts with Aish and Company did not begin to appreciate the possible extent of excess profits until the meeting with the company in March 1982. We conclude that the information provided to MoD by the two former employees probably did have a material effect on the MoD's post costing activities at this firm (paragraph 39).

(xi) We note that Treasury and MoD do not rule out the possibility of compensation to individuals who have helped MoD to identify possible excess profits but that the value and propriety of any compensation proposals would need to be considered very carefully (paragraph 40)'; and believes that compensation should be paid for loss of income and professional opportunity arising from whistleblowing in the case of Aish and Company.]

As the recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee have been rejected in the Treasury minute, will my right hon. Friend ensure that a Minister explains the decision in the first week after the recess?

Mr. Biffen: The normal processes whereby PAC recommendations are considered by the Treasury mean that eventually the recommendations come before the House. I shall examine the matter that my hon. Friend has raised to ascertain the prospects for an early debate.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Arising from points of order yesterday, and having been encouraged by the response of the Leader of the House, I ask the right hon. Gentleman what arrangements he proposes to make to advise the House about the use of the Member's Dining Room when we return from the summer recess. What arrangement is it proposed to make for the House to debate the use of all these facilities, which is giving cause for widespread concern in all parts of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I have a statement that says that no action will be taken to bring into operation the proposed Dining Room experiment until there have been further discussions by the Catering Sub-Committee in the autumn. I know that one cannot win them all. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter. As for these matters being debated, the activities of the Service Committee give rise to debates on the Floor of the House. I am sure that such opportunities will arise in future as they have in the past.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): May I remind my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House of the exchange that we had a fortnight ago on 10 July when I put it to him that the proposal to use Fulbeck airfield as a possible nuclear dump was a breach of the statement made by Sir Thomas Dugdale on 20 July 1954, which is reported in Hansard at column 1190? My right hon. Friend told me a fortnight ago that he would do his best to arrange for an early statement on whether this policy was a breach of existing policy. So far as I know, he has not done so. Will he tell me what he has done to obtain an early answer, or what he proposes to do?

Mr. Biffen: I shall inquire to see whether the July lethargy is on account of myself or the Department concerned. When that has been done, I shall be in touch with my hon. Friend.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1105 in the names of my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) and 24 right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House?

[That this House condemns the oppressive enforced corralling into artificial villages of country people in Ethiopia by the Government of Ethiopia, thus driving them from their land at a great cost in human lives and provoking among the survivors a new wave of emigration of refugees into neighbouring countries like Somalia which have economic problems enough already; and therefore calls upon the Government of Ethiopia to terminate this inhuman practice forthwith, since failure to do so should be construed by Her Majesty's Government as an unco-operative action bordering on genocide which merits the curtailment of British development and food aid to Ethiopia.]

The motion remonstrates against the enforced corralling into artificial villages by the Marxist Government of Ethiopia of the hapless people of their country. This has precipitated a mass exodus of refugees into neighbouring countries, which are poor enough already. If there is no time available for a statement on this matter to the effect that representations will be made by Her Majesty's Government against this inhumane treatment, will he ensure that the matter will be accorded the priority that we attach to inhumane behaviour in southern Africa?

Mr. Biffen: There is no time for a statement. The Government have made their concern clear to the Ethiopian authorities. That was reported to the House on 23 May.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): As the Prime Minister is responsible primarily for the sad state of affairs of the Commonwealth games that are to start in Edinburgh tonight, will the Leader of the House advise the Prime Minister not to go to Edinburgh because she would not be welcomed by more than a dozen Scotsmen?

Mr. Biffen: Despite all his many years in the House, the hon. Gentleman has not grasped the constitutional relationship between the Prime Minister and myself. I cannot undertake the task that he requests. The views of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister much more robustly coincide with the views of the British public than do those of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on recent developments in local government so that we can take account of the fact that the Ealing Labour-controlled council has recently sacked the town clerk because he insisted——

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman will next be sacked.

Mr. Greenway: —on being politically impartial? The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) will be sacked before anyone else. The same council is intimidating all its employees politically. The people of Ealing are worried that the Labour council now seeks to install a stooge town clerk to do its political bidding. Something must be done.

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making a pertinent point which should have very much wider circulation. I hope, therefore, that he will treat his question as a trailer to the contribution that he will make in the debate on whether we should adjourn for the summer recess.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that many of us believe that before the House goes into recess we should have a statement on the Foreign Secretary's trip to South Africa, which has turned out to be as worthless as we predicted it would be?

As for the report of the Select Committee on Defence on Westland, how does the Leader of the House take it that, while the debate takes place in the country, in the media and elsewhere, the House will be denied the opportunity of being able to contribute to the debate? No provision has been made for us to debate the issue during the week after our return from the summer recess. Is this not a disgraceful abuse and typical of the way in which this Administration run matters?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman could well reconcile himself to the fact that life goes on whether the House is in session or not. Many active political debates take place irrespective of whether the House is in session. I am not sure that necessarily the nation is that much the poorer. I take account of what the hon. Gentleman says about the importance of the debate. I have already shown a willingness to consider the matter further in my response to the Leader of the Opposition. There is no intransigence on my part.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): I regret having to pursue the Stalker affair with my right hon. Friend once again. I am sure that by the time the House resumes in the autumn the matter will have been resolved and, therefore, will no longer be sub judice. I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 1153, which is indicative of the concern that is felt on both sides of the House about the Stalker affair.

[That this House is concerned about the damage being caused by the continuing uncertainty arising from the investigation of a complaint made against the Deputy Chief Constable of the Greater Manchester Police; notes that this matter has been under investigation since 28th May 1986, if not earlier; notes further that the House will rise on Friday 25th July 1986 and not return until the Autumn; and urges the Police Complaints Authority to bring the case to an early conclusion and to report before the House rises so as to enable hon. Members to have the opportunity of raising the wider issues involved.]

If the matter is dealt with by the appropriate authorities before the House returns in the autumn, will sympathetic consideration be given at some time during the early weeks of the new Session to the matter being discussed by the House?

Mr. Biffen: I understand entirely the point made by my hon. Friend. He may have noted that in my reply to the Leader of the Opposition I referred to the early-day motion. I think that we should see how the matter stands when we return towards the end of October. I shall be prepared to consider any requests from my hon. Friend at that time.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Leader of the House ask the Foreign Secretary to have words, during the summer recess, with the Chinese and Hong Kong Governments on the proposed construction of a nuclear power plant near Hong Kong? Early-day motion 1157 expresses widespread concern and fear.

[That this House, noting the grave concern of the general public of Hong Kong at the building of the proposed nuclear power plant at Daya Bay in the Guangdong Province of China, notes the opposition by a coalition of more than 100 trade unions, professional groups, community and local organisations and the petition signed by 700,000 citizens in two weeks which supports the anti-nuclear opposition backed by civic and church leaders, academics and scientists; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to make urgent representations to the Chinese Government for the re-siting of this plant from close proximity to the Crown Colony, the most densely populated region on earth.]

Do any contingency plans exist for evacuation in the event of a serious accident at the proposed plant?

Mr. Biffen: Probably the best thing that I can do to assist the hon. Gentleman is to refer the early-day motion to the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, and ask my right hon. and learned Friend to get in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): My right hon. Friend knows that those enthusiasts on the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill are doing their best to get things moving by holding hearings during the summer recess. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Committee has gone a step further in its efforts to help Eurotunnel by refusing to hear evidence from the ferry companies and others on the financial viability of the tunnel and the safety considerations of the tunnel? In view of the unprecedented and bizarre——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member disclosing what is going on in the Select Committee?

Mr. Aitken: No; I am disclosing what has not gone on in the Select Committee. I am about to ask for a debate. In view of the bizarre and unprecedented suppression of evidence, which, incidentally——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Member should ask for a debate and then sit down.

Mr. Aitken: I ask my right hon. Friend to ensure that as soon as the House resumes we shall have an early debate so that the House and the country may hear the evidence that has been censored.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has such an enviable innocence in the way he presents his propositions. I should like to examine carefully what he has said before deciding whether we should have a debate.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I fear that the Leader of the House is becoming rather bored with our regular exchanges about the treatment of visitors at Heathrow. What are the Government doing to stop Heathrow being thrown into chaos as from the middle of next month by action taken by immigration officers concerned about the treatment of visitors and angry about their conditions? I see that the Minister of State is giving some information to his bag carrier. I think that the Secretary of State for Transport should be concerned. What are the Government doing to stop the chaos arising at Heathrow?

Mr. Biffen: I think that, with a perceptive judgment, the hon. Gentleman has referred to me as a bag carrier of the Treasury Bench.

Mr. Madden: I did not mean the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Biffen: I see. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that this is a tentative, sort of headline answer to the points that he raised. To assist in solving the difficult position that he has described, there has been a redeployment of staff and the provision of extra accommodation. There have been discussions with the Nigerian Government and Nigeria Airways, as the position largely derives from the influx of Nigerians. I shall ask the Home Secretary to get in touch with the hon. Gentleman further.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the insidious document published recently by the Civil Aviation Authority, calling for more night flights at Heathrow and Gatwick airports? Is he further aware of the grave disquiet in my constituency about that possibility among people whose lives have been thrown into turmoil by aircraft noise? Will my right hon. Friend make arrangements for the House to debate this important matter that touches on people's lives in a most profound way?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend perfectly describes a phenomenon that is immensely irritating in environmental terms in selected areas of the United Kingdom. I suggest that, in the first instance, my hon. Friend raises the matter in an Adjournment debate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall endeavour to call those hon. Members who have been rising. That may give more scope to others seeking to speak in the debates or the Adjournment motion.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Fees Office has confirmed that a letter is to be sent out this weekend regarding the vote on Members' allowances? As the House is not sitting for the next three months, and as it is rumoured that the letter contains a shock or a surprise, can he tell us what it is?

Mr. Biffen: There is no shock or a surprise. It is merely a commonsense observation that the vote that took place was on the proposals for the current year. They were not intended to be retrospective.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I refer to the Education Bill and the Division on the caning amendment that was lost on Tuesday. Can my right hon. Friend arrange for a statement to be made when the House resumes—prior to the further debate on the Education Bill—so that inquiries can be carried out? A number of Conservative Members, both for and against caning, were prevented from getting to the Division Lobby in time because of celebrations prior to the royal wedding. Although I am not asking for a rerun, it would be helpful if the Sessional Order could be brought to the attention of the Commissioner of the Metropolitan police and all police surrounding Parliament square to ensure that hon. Members can get here to vote.

Mr. Biffen: I am satisfied that the police authorities did their best to ensure passage. There were quite unprecedented crowds. If they had been moved on to enable a gaggle of parliamentarians to cast a vote, it would have soured the atmosphere of the evening's celebrations.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): On a much lighter and harmonious note, in view of the end of term, I ask the Leader of the House whether he has studied my early-day motion 1146.

[That this House recognises the superb artistry of the Bolshoi Ballet; is grateful for the happiness and pleasure given to our citizens throughout the medium of television and by the performance at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden and elsewhere; and urges Presidents, Prime Ministers and government, both East and West, to pursue actions which maximise those things which make for common accord and minimise those matters which are divisive.]

I know that the right hon. Gentleman will be busy in the next three months trying to maintain his majority in his constituency. He will not have the responsibility of thinking up answers to business questions at 2 o'clock in the morning, so he will be ready for Thursdays. As we shall not have time for a debate, and in spite of the fact that he once told me that he was the greatest philistine in the House, will he find time to go to see the Bolshoi Ballet and give it some encouragement?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the lobbyists for the Bolshoi Ballet should provide me with a free ticket.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Is my right hon. Friend aware, if the Labour party is not, that if there were an early debate on the Westland inquiry, the House's attention would have to be drawn to paragraph 183 of the Committee's report where part of the Committee unanimously absolved the Prime Minister from any blame or responsibility in the matter? Is it not nonsense on the part of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) to talk about collusion when he has not read the report?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. When we have a debate that can take account of the Government's response and the reflective consideration of the report, I hope that my hon. Friend will be lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, and take part in the debate.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 842.

[That this House expresses regret at Her Majesty's Government's refusal to recognise the plight of sufferers from abnormality of the feet; noting that this condition is mainly a result of spina bifida, polio, osteomyelitis and hydrocephalus, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is urged to understand and appreciate the seriousness of the problem and to reconsider the appeals emanating from the Stockport Odd Feet Association for special concessions regarding the relief from value-added tax on the purchase of the second pair of shoes required for this particular disability.]

The motion expresses regret at the Government's refusal to recognise the plight of sufferers from abnormality of the feet, mainly from polio and spina bifida. We ask for concessions on a second pair of shoes that disabled people must purchase.

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing my attention to the early-day motion. At this stage of the Session, the most helpful thing that I could do would be to draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to its content.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I ask my right hon. Friend whether, at an early stage when we return in October, we can have a debate on the future of the British Steel Corporation, especially in the light of its profits announced for the last financial year and its productivity compared with some years ago. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be opportune to review the success of the corporation and where it goes here?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend will appreciate that there are a great many demands on time, even in the overspill, but I shall certainly take account of his request, not least because the steel industry remains not only an important industry but an increasingly successful one.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Tony Banks.

Mr. Tony Banks: That cost me 50p, Mr. Speaker. Will the Leader of the House explain to me, as a relatively new and inexperienced Member——

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Hear, hear.

Mr. Banks: Coming from the hon. Gentleman, that is rather rich. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why we need so long a period for the summer recess? A considerable amount of business on which hon. Members are pressing for a debate has yet to be considered. The other place will be sitting a week longer and returning two weeks earlier than the House of Commons. I realise that all right hon. and hon. Members have lots to do, but we shall be deprived of a valuable platform which we can use as Members of Parliament.

Will the right hon. Gentleman explain these points? What are the procedures? How is the length of the recess decided? I am sure that I am not the only person who is interested in knowing the answers; the rest of the country must be interested as well.

Mr. Biffen: The recess is just a touch longer than the average recess at this time of the year, but there is not much in it. I think that most hon. Members find it valuable to have a reasonably lengthy break. I know that the hon. Gentleman would be deeply saddened if he could not attend the Labour party conference. Such considerations stretch the days. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I did not expect to hear such hostility on the Labour Benches at the prospect of a Labour party conference. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition needs even more time off to train Labour Members.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): On the question of the recess, does my right hon. Friend agree that, in the time in which we have both been Members, July has always been a month with a mixture of high drama and boredom and that some of the high drama is real and some is simulated? Does he know that at the beginning of 1988—my right hon. Friend has to look ahead—there will be a change in school terms? Because of the examination changes, all the schools will break up for the holidays at the beginning of July. This will create problems for hon. Members who have children. This will apply to Government maintained and independent schools through the new examination changes. What will my right hon. Friend do? Will we have an extra month's holiday, or should I say working recess? My right hon. Friend will have to plan next year for the Commons' programme the year after.

Mr. Biffen: I wish devoutly that July had more boredom and less high drama. Voices around me have told me that my hon. Friend was totally misconceived in suggesting that revolutionary changes in school holidays were ahead. I suspect that, if revolutionary changes in school holidays occur, this place in due course will change, and then there will be a chorus of complaints that we no longer have the 90-day recesses which we used to have which gave us a chance to travel overseas, to go round our constituencies, to be with our families and to put matters in better perspective. One cannot win.

Mr. Tom Clarke rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Tom Clarke. I am sorry about the bet.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that you will accept, Mr. Speaker, that no Scotsman ever regretted going home with an extra 50p in his pocket. This is no exception. In view of the astonishing reply by the Leader of the House to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), has the right hon. Gentleman borne in mind that my right hon. Friend was merely reflecting the tone of the report? Does he accept that the last sentence in the report gives witnesses who feel that they have been unfairly treated the chance to put matters right? What practical steps will the Government take within the next few days to make that possible?

Mr. Biffen: If the hon. Gentleman's point is valid—I do not have the advantage of having read the report—it is a great argument for having the debate later rather than earlier.

Severn Crossing

4.24 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about a second Severn crossing.

In February 1984 my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Transport announced the Government's decision to proceed with a programme of strengthening and repair for the Severn crossing. That programme is well under way and is proceeding well. At the same time my right hon. Friend announced that he intended to initiate a study into the way in which a second crossing might be provided in the same general corridor as the existing crossing. Consultants were appointed later in the year and asked to report by August this year. I am glad to say that the consultants have completed their work ahead of time and copies of the report have today been placed in the Library of the House.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and I have considered the consultants' findings and recommendations and have decided that a second Severn crossing should be provided. We propose that this new crossing should be a bridge sited at the English Stones, about three miles downstream of the existing crossing with connections to the M4 on both banks and with an additional southerly link to the M5. The new bridge would carry a dual two-lane motorway with hard shoulders. The consultants advise us that it will be possible to provide windshielding on the bridge.

We are proceeding with the next stage of planning immediately. This is a major project and much work remains to be done and consultations set in hand. I am sure that the House will welcome this commitment to build a second crossing of the Severn on the main route into south Wales. I know that this decision will also be very widely welcomed in Wales. The Government have always recognised the vital importance of the Severn crossing to the economy of Severnside and south Wales. Our action in strengthening the existing crossing, and the commissioning of this report, its completion by the consultants within the timetable set and the decisions that I have announced today confirm our determination to ensure that the crossings are adequate for future traffic needs and underline our commitment to the future economic development of the Principality.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I welcome the statement. It is welcome news and an important proposal in the history of the south Wales economy. The report's conclusions brutally spell out the delays and their economic consequences for the 1990s at the existing bridge. There was no alternative but to build. The Wales Trades Union Congress, the Confederation of British Industry and Gwent county council have long sought such a statement.

Will the Secretary of State join me in acknowledging the persistent campaign over a decade of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who fights so hard for his constituency and the county of Gwent?

I wish to put a series of questions to the right hon. Gentleman. How many jobs will the project create? How much will it cost? How could the right hon. Gentleman telescope the planning procedures to ensure the earliest possible start? Will the new bridge be tolled? There will be implications for the existing bridge either way and for the M4 and M5.

Will the Welsh Office budget bear the cost of the new bridge? Which Department — the Welsh Office or the Department of Transport — will sponsor the bridge? Which Department is in charge in terms prosecuting the building of the bridge? Will the cost of the bridge affect the other budgets of the Secretary of State for Wales? We know that he has many other important economic and social programmes, and we want none to fall aside because the bridge is to be built. What is the right hon. Gentleman's estimate of the construction time? Does he agree that the steel, cement, construction and transport industries will gain greatly from the project? Because windshields for the bridge are mentioned in the report, will be comment on the safety factors?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the second crossing will give the south Wales economy a major boost and avoid expensive and damaging hold-ups at the existing bridge? Does he agree that south Wales will become an even more attractive location for modern job prospects and especially for the location of manufacturing projects from Japan, Europe and the United States?

This is an exciting development for the 133,000 unemployed citizens of the five south Wales counties, where male unemployment is one in four. It is an immense psychological boost to the economy. It will restore confidence from Cardiff to Brussels and it will create many jobs and buttress others. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to press on with all speed. The Opposition believe in the urgent need for this project and a Labour Government would build a second crossing with ruthless speed. It is the key to a better industrial future for Wales.

Mr. Edwards: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the tone and warmth of his welcome and for the support he has given to the decision. I agree that it will be widely welcomed by many and I acknowledge that many have compaigned for a long time.

The cost of the actual construction is given in the consultants' report, at 1986 prices, as £183 million. However, when we come to the total cost involved, including land acquisition and other matters, it will be over £200 million. I would not wish to be more specific than that at the moment.

The hon. Gentleman asked about telescoping the planning arrangements. I hope that when he talked about proceeding at ruthless speed he was not suggesting that there should not be proper consultation with those that will be affected. I can confirm that we are as anxious as he is to waste no time in getting on with the necessary procedures. We are getting on to the next stage at once with a sense of urgency on the basis that a bridge must be provided as soon as it is needed and Parliament so decides. We wish to be in a position to provide the crossing by the mid-1990s but, of course, the decisions at each stage will have to have regard to the way in which the traffic develops.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the process we will follow. As I said, we are going ahead without pause on the planning arrangements. Our intention is to proceed by way of legislation to avoid planning procedures being unduly prolonged. However, as I have emphasised, there will have to be proper consultation with those affected. In order to get the maximum possible speed when we are ready to go ahead and the greatest economic advantage, if the outcome of the present tendering exercise for Dartford tunnel proves successful — there is every sign that it will — we shall consider using similar procedures.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Welsh Office budget and which Department will be responsible for the bridge. Both the Department of Transport and the Welsh Office have worked in the closest possible collaboration on this matter. I should like to pay a tribute to the former Secretary of State for Transport, now the Secretary of State for the Environment, for the considerable effort that he put in to getting this matter going in the fastest possible time. I would also like to express my appreciation for the way in which the present Secretary of State for Transport has thought it right, in view of the importance of the announcement for south Wales, that I should make this statement. I must emphasise that this is a project for which both Departments are responsible. However, the actual construction of the bridge will be the responsibility of the Department of Transport. My Department will clearly be involved in the approach roads on the Welsh side and the Department of Transport will be involved in the approach roads on the English side. The Department of Transport has the technical expertise, which clearly makes it appropriate for it to be the responsible Department.

The hon. Gentleman asked about windshields. One of the reasons for going so carefully into the question of the tunnel alternative was because of our concern about the wind. One of the benefits of having undertaken this important and essential study is that it has come to the conclusion that windshields can be provided effectively so that traffic will not be delayed and interrupted as it has been in the past.

The hon. Gentleman emphasised the enormous importance of this decision for the economy of south Wales. May I also point out that it is an important decision for the economy of Avon as well? It is a fact that 60 per cent. of the traffic crossing the present bridge goes from south Wales to the Bristol area and that the proposed plan will shorten the journey by about 14 km. We are talking about a project of importance for the whole of Severnside and south Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I welcome the statement and the fact that it is being made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. I say that with no disrespect to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I feel that it further underlines the Government's commitment to the economy of south Wales and the importance of the Severn bridge as a prime feature there. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that this statement fulfils a promise previously given that the Government would ensure that a second crossing of the Severn would be in place as soon as it was needed? May we hope that we need have no more unnecessary scare stories about the present Severn bridge, which have certainly done nothing to help the economy of south Wales?

Mr. Edwards: It is our intention to provide the bridge as soon as it is needed, taking account of the build-up of traffic. That must be the right way to proceed. We have gone ahead to ensure the absolute security of the present crossing. The limitation of the present crossing is in terms of capacity. There is now clear evidence that we shall face an increasing capacity problem into the mid-1990s.

[Mr. Edwards]

Therefore, we are going ahead with the planning for the next stage of the new bridge so that it can be provided when necessary. As I have said, we are taking every step to ensure that the time scale is kept as short as possible on the assumption that the traffic builds up in the way we expect.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau, Gwent): I certainly congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the statement. However, many Opposition Members think that a special tribute is due to my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) and Gwent county council. They have fought so long for this project. May I say that perhaps the best way of celebrating would be to abolish tolls on the present bridge and make sure that we do not have tolls on the new one?

Mr. Edwards: If it makes people happy to be congratulated, no doubt congratulations will come. The truth is that everyone who has had the smallest knowledge of the south Wales economy has recognised the importance of securing this crossing. The Government have made their determination to do that absolutely plain from the word go. It has not needed any lobbying either by the hon. Member for Newport, East or by Gwent county council to bring the Government to that decision. However, I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman welcomes the announcement.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to tolls. The Government have made a statement about their tolls policy. This enables me to answer a question put by the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) that I did not answer. The cost of the bridge will fall within the appropriate departmental budgets in the normal way. However, a toll regime and the possibilities opened up by the Dartford tunnel procedure may offer the possibility of reducing the demand on the public purse and making it possible to build more of the other roads in England and Wales, which I have no doubt hon. Members will continue to demand. I see the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) agreeing with those views. I know that his party does not want a Severn bridge at all and has argued that frequently. However, I know that he will be pressing me for other roads and I am sure that he will support a private option and a toll regime in order to produce the maximum possible resources.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): It will come as no surprise to my right hon. Friend to know that his announcement will be warmly welcomed in west Gloucestershire. Whenever there was a problem with the Severn bridge, whether it be wind or repairs, the traffic was always diverted up the A48, which runs straight through my constituency and there was absolute mayhem on that road with all the extra traffic.

As congratulations are in order, I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend on not simply talking about something but doing something about it. It is all very well to congratulate Opposition Members on their input in lobbying my right hon. Friend but deeds come much harder than words. It is easy to talk and very difficult to grasp the nettle. I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend on behalf of all my constituents on what he has done today. The inclusion of windshielding is an exceedingly good idea because often in the past the present Severn bridge has been closed because of high winds.

Mr. Edwards: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's thanks and I know that the decision will be welcomed in his constituency. He talked about deeds, but the House must understand from the consultants' report that the Severn is the most difficult estuarial crossing anywhere in Britain and this is a major undertaking. All the work done in the present study was an absolutely essential precursor to the further work and could not have been avoided. Indeed, without it we would never have reached our present knowledge about the possibilities of windshielding and of maintenance-free depths. We hope that with the form of bridge envisaged, which will have a short bridge section in the centre of the channel, it will be possible to avoid some of the resurfacing and maintenance problems that exist on the present bridge. That sort of fact has emerged as a result of the study.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): We warmly welcome the proposals for a second Severn crossing, and believe that it is absolutely necessary and will be of particular benefit to the south Wales economy. Will the Secretary of State say whether he will publish a timetable for the construction of the bridge? Can he tell us why a two-lane rather than a three-lane bridge will be constructed, when there is congestion on the present two-lane bridge? Why was a tunnel rejected when 100 years ago a certain Mr. I. K. Brunel was capable of constructing one for the railways? Has a Severn barrage been considered in connection with the new bridge crossing? Will the Secretary of State consider writing off the debt of the present Severn bridge?

Mr. Edwards: We are constructing an additional dual two-lane motorway with hard shoulders, which will work in tandem with the existing bridge. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman has not yet had the opportunity to read the lengthy, detailed report which makes clear recommendations about the adequacy of the solution, or to read why the consultants recommend a bridge solution rather than a tunnel solution. That has been decided not merely on cost terms, although there is a considerable cost advantage, but on operational terms. It would probably not be possible to provide hard shoulders in a tunnel and we have all learnt the importance of having them. The relevance of a barrage crossing between Cardiff and the Weston-super-Mare area to the general traffic flow from Cardiff along the M4 to London and, substantially, into the Bristol area can, at the most, be extremely marginal. We are also concerned with getting an early crossing when it is required for traffic, and not having to await possible prolonged discussions on a barrage project. The two matters are not related.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments, particularly as I know of the importance of the project for both Wales and Avon. It could generate thousands of jobs on both sides of the Severn at its peak of construction. May I take this opportunity to draw to my right hon. Friend's attention the fact that many hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Cope), will represent their constituents' interests on environmental matters during the planning process?

Mr. Edwards: I can confirm the benefit that will accrue to the Avon area and the shorter journey times involved, which is a reason why we decided to choose the M5 link. Despite the need for prompt and effective action, I fully understand the importance of consulting properly and ensuring both that the interests of local people are guarded as fully as possible in building this major road link and that the usual compensation arrangements will apply. The Severn estuary is an environmentally important area, so we must do our best to ensure that the environment is protected, although I believe that in many ways the bridge will be a positive feature in the landscape.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): The fact that the statement is made by the Secretary of State for Wales rather than the Secretary of State for Transport shows that Conservative Central Office is more worried about election results in south Wales than in south-west England. It was only in a late answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) that the county of Avon and the fact that there is another bank to the bridge was mentioned. I agree with the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) that there is a second bank to the bridge and that those who represent the people on that side want their full share of the work and benefits that will flow from its construction. It is not good enough to present the proposal to the House merely as a benefit for Wales. There are two sides to this and I hope that that will be borne in mind.

Mr. Edwards: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong in saying that it needed my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) to draw attention to the Avon side of the bridge. I drafted that section of the statement and expressly inserted a reference to "Severnside" because I fully appreciate that the proposal affects both sides. I welcome the invitation of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to me to make this statement because it helps to emphasise the close collaboration between the two Departments in what is an essential junction for communities on both sides of the estuary.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, West): May I join the general chorus of congratulations to my right hon. Friend on his welcome announcement? I wish to follow the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) and the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks). Has my right hon. Friend worked out, or does he intend to work out, any way in which the undoubted economic benefits for the area as a whole—that is, both south Wales and Avon—can be equalised so that contractors on the Avon side of the estuary will compete on equal terms with those on the subsidised assisted area on the Severn side?

Mr. Edwards: I do not know of subsidies for road contractors which would allow one side to have a competitive advantage over the other. Obviously, we shall consider many important matters, such as whether the tender is competitive and the technical ability of the contractor to carry out this formidable engineering task. We shall in the next phase consider the options opened up to us by the Dartford tunnel procedures and the possibility of producing a design and tender operating procedure.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): My right hon. Friend and his colleagues deserve the warmest congratulations on having conducted a careful study and on having acted so swiftly on its results. Does he agree that this shows that excellent communications are by far the best way of bringing jobs to areas, whether we speak of north Wales, south Wales or Avonside?

Mr. Edwards: I agree. We have taken the decision in the month in which we are considering tenders for the Conwy tunnel crossing, which will be the largest such operation yet undertaken in the United Kingdom. Therefore, we are tackling with massive new engineering schemes two of the major traffic needs of the Principality, and that should be taken on board.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): The right hon. Gentleman can be assured that there will be a welcome in south Wales for his announcement. Everyone is happy about it as it is important to our economy. Whatever the Secretary of State said in respect of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), he is the man who will have tribute paid to him for his persistence. It is a pity that the Secretary of State is insistent about tolls. Will he ensure that if we must have tolls, we have toll points on both sides of the bridge to avoid the problem on the present bridge of traffic waiting on the bridge?

Mr. Edwards: No doubt the world will be amazed at this desperate need to find some form of support for the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes). It will be amazing if the world is ever brought to believe that he influenced the Government's decision on this major project, but if people think that he did, so be it.

The hon. Gentleman will see, when he comes to read the consultants' report that the consultants address themselves to the question of toll booths and where they might be positioned. Clearly that is a practical matter that will have to be gone into in some detail before a final decision is taken.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Secretary of State has done me the courtesy of quoting what I would have said before I said it so that I do not need to repeat it.

In terms of transportation priorities, both cross-border and within Wales, can he say what the effect will be on his departmental vote? In particular, what effect might this have on the need to dual the Heads of the Valleys road and to improve transportation within the valleys? Does the fact that either he or his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport propose to introduce a Bill have implications for the environmental safeguards that will be required on the estuary?

Mr. Edwards: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's confirmation that Plaid Cymru in fact is opposed to a second Severn crossing, and wants the road to be built elsewhere. I had not thought he would do that.

Mr. Thomas: I did not say that.

Mr. Edwards: That was what I said, and the hon. Gentleman thanked me for confirming it. If there is some misunderstanding, perhaps it can be settled within his party.

I can tell him that we are consulting on the other priorities for the 1990s in Wales, as he knows, and will consider the various recommendations currently being put to us from all over Wales.

With regard to environmental issues, we clearly have to give an adequate opportunity for those who will be affected to comment, and we shall do that. The object of the legislation is to avoid the possible long delays that can take place if one uses traditional planning procedures, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, can take 10 or 15 years on such a project.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): The sum of £200 million is a great deal of money, but there is no doubt that on commercial criteria alone this expenditure is justified. That being the case, have we not missed an opportunity to contain public expenditure with this project? As it is commercially justifiable, could we not, as with the Channel tunnel, have had it done through the private sector?

Mr. Edwards: What I said about the Dartford tunnel options may not be clear. The whole of the Dartford tunnel tendering procedure was designed to ascertain whether a privately financed solution was practical. My right hon. Friend is at present considering the tenders received. In the light of that experience, we shall certainly want to see whether that is a possibility in this case. As I pointed out earlier, it could release resources for all the other desirable road projects that people want.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I am sorry to hear the Secretary of State steadfastly refuse to congratulate Gwent county council and my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes). I wondered whether the Minister's statement is a result of a sudden realisation by the Conservative party that the general election is well above the horizon. Is there a fund of some sort for these projects that will be announced? If so, will anything be available to other parts of Wales? In particular, could we have a dual carriageway on the A483 instead of the present ragbag of roads — unless, of course, the Secretary of State has already resigned himself to the fact that the constituencies of Delyn and Clwyd, South-West will be Labour gains at the next election?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has clearly failed to recognise that we appointed the consultants some two years ago to report in August, and they have reported ahead of schedule. We said that we would report on the consultants' conclusions as soon as possible. Not only have we reported on the conclusions of the report, we have announced our decision on where the road will go. In view of what he said about roads in his part of the world, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will support a privately financed bridge, if that proves a feasible option proposition.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): The Secretary of State well knows that on 29 November 1984 the Government cut the percentage of the working population in Wales qualifying for regional development grant from 90 per cent. to 35 per cent. In order to maximise the advantages of the new bridge to the economy of south Wales, does he intend to restore those losses?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has grossly misrepresented the statistical position because, under the different arrangements, a very high proportion of the population of Wales receives regional assistance. What we have done is to change the pattern of regional assistance so that Wales benefits considerably more from regional assistance, as was pointed out by one of my hon. Friends. What this will do, as the consultants clearly point out, is to give a considerable further boost to regional policy.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): Can I seek the assurance that this is a genuine additional bridge, a complementary bridge, rather than a replacement bridge? Many people in south Wales fear that the present bridge will never be fully safely operational again. Wales needs two bridges, not one and a half.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. We are pressing on with the programme. It is going well. We are confident that, when it is complete, the present bridge will be absolutely secure as a crossing. As I said earlier, the limitations on that bridge are those of capacity. We are now seeking to enlarge substantially the capacity of the crossing.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): I welcome the statement, and I am glad that it has been made by the Secretary of State for Wales. The crossing of the Severn is a vital connection to and from Wales. I say this with no disrespect to the Secretary of State for Transport who is in his place in the Chamber.

Broadly speaking, the scheme is what I have been advocating for quite some time and, in that sense, I have been backed up by my right hon. and hon. Friends, by county councils like Gwent and by Newport borough council. Will the Secretary of State appreciate that this is the culmination of several years of campaigning that commenced with the famous Adjournment debate on 28 October 1983 when I was alone in the Chamber with the hon. Lady the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker)? [Interruption.] She was promoted after that.

Contrary to what the Secretary of State has told the House today, does he appreciate that there were many fainthearts at that time, some of them in high places, but later on even CBI Wales started to sit up and take notice, and that took a bit of doing?

I regret, of course, that there is no intention as yet on the part of the Government to abolish tolls on estuarial crossings. I advise and urge the Government to think again about this matter, particularly bearing in mind the horrific unemployment situation in Wales, about which so much needs to be done.

Can the Secretary of State tell us about the proposed time scale for the building of the bridge? Will he, apart from being ruthless about planning, try to ensure that the planning procedures are sharpened up? Did he, like me, note a little apathy in the third paragraph in the conclusion of the report in its reference to delays in future years? Can I assure the Secretary of State, on behalf of thousands of motorists, that lane closures, delays and frustration very much exist already? They need to be eliminated as quickly as possible.

Finally, will the Secretary of State assure the House that the contract for the building of the bridge will be awarded to a British company, because there is already speculation to the contrary?

Mr. Edwards: If that was the speculation before the House had even been told of the decision to build, one can see the value of it. I have laid down the criteria that the Department of Transport will have to take into account in choosing the contractors. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is pleased about the decision that we have taken. A great many people, including the hon. Gentleman, have made representations over the years, none more vigorously than my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson), whose first parliamentary question in the House addressed itself to this very topic. If credit is to be given to anyone, it is to the hon. Member within the Government and my Department, who has never ceased to press the importance of the matter upon me.

Royal Ordnance plc

5 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about Royal Ordnance plc.

On 17 June, I announced the Government's decision not to proceed with the planned flotation of Royal Ordnance plc. I also made it clear in answer to questions on 18 June that we would review all the various options to decide how best to achieve our aim of privatisation. That review is now completed and I can tell the House that, with the exception of one factory, it remains our firm preference to sell the company as a whole. We would hope to do so by a private sale if that proves practicable. Over the coming weeks, we shall be inviting bids on the basis of a selling memorandum and I shall report further to the House when we have made some concrete progress.

The exception is the tank-building business at Leeds. Following discussions between the Ministry of Defence and Vickers, an offer has been made by Vickers plc to purchase Royal Ordnance Leeds, which the Government and the board of Royal Ordnance have accepted, subject to detailed discussions now taking place between Royal Ordnance and Vickers to finalise the agreement. The price will be related to an audited net asset value but we expect it to be about £11 million. As part of the agreement, Vickers will build a major new facility at the Leeds site, similar to its factory at Newcastle. That reflects its faith in the business and its determination to win the export orders that are critical to the continuing future of the factory.

I can also tell the House that in the light of the agreement, the way is now clear for a decision to order a seventh regiment of Challenger tanks, subject to detailed contract terms. Vickers has agreed that the tanks will be manufactured at Leeds and we have negotiated with Vickers prices that represent an improvement on the terms offered by Royal Ordnance. I am satisfied that the competitive pressures that have operated on both companies during our various negotiations have ensured that the Ministry of Defence will receive good value for money for this important order.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The most significant and perhaps the most disturbing announcement in the statement, which was leaked heavily in this morning's newspapers, is the sale of the tank factory at Leeds to its main and only competitor, Vickers. We believe that that sale is another step in what will turn out to be the dismemberment of the Royal Ordnance factories. The Secretary of State's "firm preference" and fine words mean nothing at all after the way in which the Government and his Department have treated both the management and employees of the Royal Ordnance factories.

It is extraordinary that a policy of privatisation that was supposed to encourage competition within the British defence industry is eliminating that competition and creating a monopoly supplier in the British economy for main battle tanks. Is the Secretary of State aware that his predecessor wrote a personal letter to all the employees of all the Royal Ordnance factories assuring them that their factories would not be sold off to a competitor, which could, by the very nature of being a competitor, close down those factories? That assurance has now been cynically and brutally abrogated by the right hon. Gentleman.

If two private sector companies were to merge the important sectors of their business in that way, a Government of the day, rightly, would refer the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The Government are doing exactly the same thing; they are promoting a merger between two competitors and thereby creating a monopoly. Why should not that be considered by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, in the national interest?

Is the right hon. Gentleman still persisting, as we think he is, in his policy of competitive tendering for defence contracts? If so, the only competition in future for the building of tanks will come from foreign competitors. In view of the amount of support that is given by foreign countries to their defence industries, there is a real danger in future that the next generation of the main battle tank for the British Army will be built not in Britain, but in France, Germany or the United States. The right hon. Gentleman's policy on the ordnance factories is in a mess, and he knows it. What he should do now is keep them in the public sector, where they have been profitable, efficient and competitive.

Mr. Younger: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not give a welcome to this encouraging announcement. I think that he will find that not only he but others will regret the fact that they have made that move at this time without looking more carefully at it. If one looks at the deal from the point of view of those whose livelihood is in building tanks, one sees it as a most important and positive step in giving those people a more secure future.

The undertaking that my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), my predecessor, gave the employees in the letter that he wrote is maintained by the decision that I have made today. It is exactly the case that the undertaking that he gave still applies. We do not envisage, as he did not, parts of Royal Ordnance being sold to someone who would wish to close them down to eliminate competition. That is most certainly not the case in this instance. The deal improves Leeds's future prospects and involves the commitment by the owners to build a major new factory in Leeds, to build those tanks. Therefore, no one can say that that commitment is not being fully carried out.

Of course, we wish to encourage competition in every way we can. One should bear in mind—I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will — that if there are two different tank manufacturers and nothing like enough business for both of them, one does not get meaningful competition except for a very short time. It follows that the new company, with the two factory sites together, should be able to be a much more powerful competitor agaist foreign competitors or, indeed, a more powerful component in collaborative ventures for the future.

With regard to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, under the Fair Trading Act it is the duty of the Director General of Fair Trading to consider and refer to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry anything that he considers should be referred to him. Any further decision thereafter will be for my right hon. Friend to make. I have no reason to think that there is any difficulty about that. No doubt that will be raised if it is thought appropriate.

Whichever way one looks at the statement, it is an important and positive announcement for the future of those who make tanks. I think that the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) will greatly regret having been so sour about it.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): My right hon. Friend knows that many of us have felt that Royal Ordnance has been unsatisfactorily handled, but what he said about the commitment of Vickers to further investment is welcome in part. As the details have not been finalised, will my right hon. Friend try to ensure that Vickers has a long-term commitment and that the investment is not simply to quicken up the Challenger tank order, after which the factory might have little to do? Surely an investment in the longer-term to diversify the product range is the answer. As many of us want to keep Royal Ordnance as an integrated company, was there no chance of a private sale that involved the whole of Royal Ordnance, including Leeds?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. His extremely close interest in the factory and everything to do with it is well known. I agree that the longer-term the commitment can be the better, but the length of any commitment for tank manufacture in Britain is bound to be affected by the likely ordering pattern for tanks. In the long term, I do not see any substantial increase in the number of tanks that are likely to be ordered by my Department. It follows that the long-term future for all those who make tanks is crucially dependent on having a highly competitive way of operating and therefore a better chance of getting foreign business. The combined arrangement will be much better placed to achieve that.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): Let me, as the constituency Member of Parliament, cheer up the Secretary of State a little. I welcome the Government's belated recognition that Barnbow is the best heavy tank factory in Britain, and the recognition by Vickers that the Barnbow work force is the best tank force in Britain. I deeply regret that the Government's 12-month delay in placing this order has made redundancies inevitable at Barnbow this autumn. However, if Barnbow is, as the Government admit, the best tank factory with the best work force, why on earth have the Government decided to sell it off to a firm with an inferior capacity, thus creating a private monopoly in which the British taxpayer is the only customer? How on earth can the Secretary of State reconcile that with his predecessor's statement that he wished to see competition—a statement that followed the passage that the right hon. Gentleman read out from his predecessor's statement?

On price, would not Vickers be able to recover the £11 million that the right hon. Gentleman says that it will pay for the factory out of the profits from the Challenger order alone? Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that if an auditor finds that the factory's assets are worth more than £11 million — this morning The Times suggested that they are worth £16 million—Vickers will have to pay the higher price?

Why should the House, or the work force at Barnbow, have any more confidence in the undertakings from Vickers that the right hon. Gentleman has just relayed than they had in the right hon. Gentleman's undertaking to sell off Royal Ordnance as a whole and not to sell it off in bits?

Mr. Younger: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his welcome of at least parts of the statement. He is very much more realistic than his right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) made the point that, as the only domestic customer for the purchase of tanks, the Ministry of Defence is in a unique position. It is my concern over the long-term future of tank manufacture in this country that leads me to the inevitable conclusion that this is by far the best solution. The right hon. Gentleman points to it being a monopoly. He might like to reflect carefully upon what the position would be if we allowed just the two - indeed, the only two - tank manufacturers in the country to battle it out for orders that are not nearly sufficient to keep the two going. There are barely enough orders to keep one of them going. The result would be that one of them would go to the wall. Therefore, it is much better for the long-term future of tank manufacture that this deal should be done.

I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the seventh regiment of Challenger tanks. I very much hope that Vickers will be able to recover the money that it has invested. I have no idea whether it thinks that it will be able to do it on one order alone, but I very much hope that it will recover the money. The quicker it recovers it, the more prosperous the company, which all depend upon, will be.

I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to have pretty good confidence in a company that is prepared not only to pay about £11 million for the assets of this factory but also to invest probably a larger sum in the building of an entirely new factory in its place on the same site and to employ most of the same work force. I should have thought that he would be very pleased indeed about that.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): I welcome the end to the uncertainty by the announcement of the Challenger order, but is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be widespread concern in Nottingham, and in the Nottingham ROF, about the fact that the natural partnership in tank production between Leeds and Nottingham will be broken. What assurance is he able to give the House that co-operation over future tank production will be maintained? One of the major points that was made at the time of privatisation by those hon. Members with Nottingham constituencies who dealt with the Bill was that the philosophy of privatisation is wider share ownership among employees. How can my right hon. Friend guarantee wider share ownership among the employees, either in Leeds or in the rest of the ROFs, on the basis of a single sale, on whatever criteria?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the points that my hon. Friend has made, and I am grateful to him for welcoming the end of the uncertainty, which will undoubtedly be a great relief to many. However, my hon. Friend will know very well—indeed, better than most—that Nottingham is to be involved in the order announced today—the seventh regiment of Challenger tanks. In future, it will no doubt be very well placed competitively to obtain further orders, or to take part in further orders, either as a sub-contractor of Vickers, if that is the most appropriate way, or in some other way with foreign firms. My hon. Friend knows better than most that a very large part of Nottingham's output is export orders. In no way will that be altered by this statement, because it remains part of Royal Ordnance.

As for wider share ownership, I should very much have liked to see a flotation, if that had been possible, in July and an opportunity for all concerned to own shares. However, I hope that the Leeds employees will find that Vickers is a good employer, and I hope that it will discuss with the unions and all concerned at Leeds how matters are to be taken forward.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The Secretary of State will be aware from what he has been told by his Minister of State, who met a number of hon. Members at a meeting to which we took shop stewards from Barnbow, that there has been much discussion about Barnbow's future in recent months, let alone recent years. One of the overall questions that all of us will have to face up to is that, whether the factories are owned by Vickers or by anybody else, the future is bleak for Barnbow and that alternative types of production there ought to be considered, because it will not be able to support the size of work force that it has supported in the past.

Fortunately, I received a letter this morning from one of the men who works at Barnbow. I did not know that the statement was to be made today. He asked me to write to the Secretary of State with some very prescient questions. He said:

"The Government decided to privatise the Royal Ordnance Factories to make them more competitive with outside industry, but now we find RO Leeds offered to our main competitor, the reason given 'there is not room for two tank factories in the country.'"

His question is this:

"If there isn't room for two tank factories in the country how on earth can there be room for two in the same company?"

It is a real question. Are the redundancies to be in Leeds or are they to be in Newcastle? There will have to be redundancies somewhere. He then went on to say that he had listened to a chap from Vickers on Radio Leeds the other night who said:

"Vickers were all for expansion not closures."

My correspondent said that his follow-up question would have been that Leeds knows all about Vickers: look what it did to Crabtrees, Manns Dawson, Payne and Elliot, Campbell and Hunters. He said that it was no use telling the people of Leeds that Vickers was going to expand; the books are clear. The factory is to be cut back even more than it would have been had it remained in the ROF.

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for some of his remarks but, with great respect to him, I do not think that to disparage what is an extremely good company is likely to be helpful either to the right hon. Gentleman or to his constituents. Vickers is now proposing to move into his area and spend a large amount of its money, not Government money, upon building a brand new factory. There are 630 constituencies in this country. They would all be very glad to have a brand new factory. The right hon. Gentleman has got that wrong. He is absolutely right, of course, about the need for diversification. To rely upon tanks alone in the long term would be difficult, but on reflection might he not think that this is at least one step in the right direction of diversification? The products that are made by Vickers at Newcastle are not the same as those which are made at Leeds. At least it will broaden the product base a little, and I certainly look to Vickers to take that further.

[Mr. Younger]

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Will my right hon. Friend accept that those of us who represent Barnbow employees in Leeds are concerned to secure both the short-term future of that company and its long-term prospects? His announcement today that the order for the seventh regiment is to be placed at Leeds and that it is guaranteed to be completed at Leeds is very welcome, as it secures the first of these objectives. I am sure that all hon. Members with Leeds constituencies will greatly thank him for that.

My right hon. Friend's announcement of major investment by Vickers in Leeds is a completely new factor, which transforms the position. Asset-stripping by Vickers would be completely unacceptable to both sides of the House. However, any further major long-term investment by a successful company like Vickers, on top of the already major investment that it has made only a couple of miles down the road at the Howson Algraphy plant in my constituency, would be very welcome. Is my right hon. Friend sure that he has secured adequate guarantees of that investment during his negotiations, and is he sure that the contract, when it is finally signed, will have that clearly embodied in it?

Mr. Younger: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend. He is completely right when he says that there are both short-term and long-term interests in this factory and its employees which are important to us all. I am glad that at least the short-term problem has been greatly helped by today's announcement. As my hon. Friend has pointed out, asset-stripping would, indeed, be unacceptable to us all. However, this is the very reverse of asset-stripping. It is, I suppose, asset-building, in that the company is coming into the area and building an entirely new factory.

As for guarantees, as part of the agreement, Vickers has given an undertaking to move ahead in the way that I have described. I am quite certain that as an honourable company of very good standing that has every intention of making this business flourish, it will carry out what it has said it has undertaken to do.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): In the interests of consistency with earlier questions that I asked the Secretary of State, may I welcome very much the order for the Challenger tanks at Barnbow? That is by far the most important immediate question for the employees at Leeds. But the key question is the duration of the order and the time span that there will be before considering further orders. Surely, with Vickers' record in the City, as the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said, the employees at Barnbow will not have much confidence for the future unless there is some sign of what will follow the order. Will the Secretary of State tell us how long the contract will last, because otherwise the belief that Vickers has bought the competition will not give the employees much faith for the long-term future?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says and I thank him for his welcome for the order for the seventh regiment. Of course, he is right to say that we must consider the longer term. No decision has been taken on any further regiments' orders for Challenger tanks. I have formulated no plans to place any such further orders. It would be wrong of me to give a guarantee that that can be done, because no such decision has been taken. Naturally, that will be considered for the future. When we consider the future of the Royal Ordnance factories we must not rely solely on future orders of tanks by the British Ministry of Defence, because they are not likely to be forthcoming in large enough quantities. This order should keep the factories going until about the end of the decade. From then on it will be a question of how well the new company manages to obtain new orders in different areas.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): Will my right hon. Friend say why, when many of us thought that a flotation was in the best interests of the ordnance factory, a private sale is now the preferred option?

Mr. Younger: Yes. I had hoped that it would be possible to have a flotation, as planned, in July. As I said to the House when I announced the decision, we could not do it in July because, in our view and that of our advisers, it was clear that the company was not in the right condition for flotation. It would have been irresponsible to float the company when it was not ready to be a robust performer in the open market. My intention remains to privatise Royal Ordnance. I hope to privatise it as a whole and I shall, of course, keep the House informed.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Where will the British Army go for tanks in the future if it is not satisfied with price and quality from Vickers? What guarantees has Vickers given for the new factory? I noticed that, when responding to questions, the Secretary of State moved from saying "facility" to saying "factory". It may be useful to define whether we mean a facility or new factory.

Mr. Younger: I am not sure what the difference is. It depends whether one is speaking English or American. I mean a factory. The Americans refer to it as a facility. In future, when the British Army seeks bids for tank orders, I hope that it obtains competitive bids from tank producers abroad——

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Such as Germany?

Mr. Younger: Yes, and I hope that there will be a much better possibility of collaborative projects for the next order of main battle tanks. I hope that Vickers, in its new form, can take part in that.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): My right hon. Friend's statement will bring some relief to my constituents at ROF Bishopton. Will the Secretary of State move swiftly to enact his expressed preference to end uncertainty? Will he respond to the rumour published in the newspapers today that the sale will not be open, but that Royal Ordnance Factories plc will be sold off to Trafalgar House?

Mr. Younger: I am pleased if my statement has helped to end difficulty and uncertainty, or at least to reduce it, at Bishopton, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) takes such an interest. I repeated today that my intention is still, if I can do so, to privatise Royal Ordnance as a whole, if that proves to be practical. I hope that this can be done as quickly as possible to eliminate uncertainty. I assure my hon. Friend, in response to her other question, that we are open to several bids to buy Royal Ordnance as a whole.

I do not envisage it being a sale to one bidder; I hope to get several bids, which will be properly evaluated, and I shall keep the House informed.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It is clear that the Secretary of State's policy is in total shreds because, having given undertakings that he would put the whole of Royal Ordnance into a flotation or on to the market as one unit, he is now selling off one little bit. Will he please tell me, since morale in the ROFs is about as low as it can go, why any employee should believe that the right hon. Gentleman's undertaking today is any more use than the undertaking given by his predecessor, which he has now totally abrogated?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) is wrong. Although it is my hope successfully to privatise Royal Ordnance in one unit, I cannot give a guarantee that that will be so. Nor have I, or my predecessors, ever given such a guarantee. I hope that the hon. Lady will understand that. On morale, I readily agree that the uncertainty for all the employees of Royal Ordnance has been unsettling during this period. I wish to end that uncertainty as quickly as I can. I can say today at least that any low morale among the tank manufacturers is ended. They now have a clear and firm future as a result of my announcement today.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents at ROF Euxton will feel massively betrayed if they have no opportunity to buy shares when he floats the rest of the Royal Ordnance organisation without the tank manufacturers? The employees went along with the privatisation provided that they had that opportunity.

Mr. Younger: I note what my hon. Friend says. If it proves possible to come to an arrangement which involves employees' share ownership, no one would be more pleased than I. My hon. Friend will probably agree that his constituents and most employees of Royal Ordnance factories will be primarily concerned that the business should be given a firm future. I must balance that fact when I consider the possible ways of privatising the factories, which I hope will be as a whole.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the Secretary of State return to the questions put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) and the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste)? Is the investment on the new factory legally binding in the agreement or is it just a promise or an understanding as outlined by the Secretary of State? If it is not legally binding, is it not possible that Vickers could rat on the deal?

Mr. Younger: I understand that, on hearing this for the first time, the hon. Gentleman wishes to have some assurance. That is part of the agreement that has been openly entered into.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is it legally binding?

Mr. Younger: Yes. It is part of the agreement that has been openly entered into by Vickers with the Ministry of Defence. If it is of any reassurance to the hon. Gentleman, Vickers intends to start work very quickly. Vickers told me that it expects to start work at the beginning of August. There can be no doubt that Vickers has every intention of going ahead as fast as it can.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): I shall resist the temptation to take issue with my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) about the relative merits of the work forces in Leeds and Newcastle. I assure him that, although my constituents work for a private company, they are nevertheless a highly skilled work force —[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I can do without the embarrassment of being supported by Conservative Members. The Secretary of State is aware that the northern region has the highest unemployment in Britain, and Tyne Bridge, where the Vickers factory is located, has one of the highest unemployment levels in the region. Therefore, it must have been in the Secretary of State's mind, when taking the decision, that it may have implications for the Newcastle factory. Will he assure the House that he has discussed the matter with the company and that there are no detrimental employment effects on the Newcastle factory?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, although I am not sure that his language was the most felicitous. He said that his constituents, although working for private enterprise, were highly skilled. I should have thought that they were highly skilled because they worked for private enterprise. It is a matter of the expression that one uses. The hon. Gentleman knows that Vickers is a good company and is extremely proud of its relatively new factory at Newcastle. It is not likely that Vickers would do anything adversely to affect that factory.

Mr. O'Brien: What was the recommendation of the board of directors of the Leeds ROF when it met on 15 July, considered a valuation of £25 million of its plant and rejected the £11 million offer of Vickers because it was less than half of the plant's value? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the profit from the tank order will exceed £10 million and that orders on the order book are also worth more than £10 million, so Vickers has a great deal of money? Will he also confirm that the 1,400 people who are employed at Leeds will be retained by Vickers, or will there be substantial job reductions? What were the management board's recommendations concerning the Vickers offer and what will the profits from tank sales and orders on the book be? Will they not be substantially more than is required to buy the factory and build a new one?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the points on which the hon. Gentleman wants answers, and I shall do my best to supply them. The board of Royal Ordnance plc, which is in control, has agreed to this arrangement. That is the essential factor. The price that is paid will be related to an audited asset value for the plant. We must bear in mind that it is all very well to draw up the asset value of a plant, but its actual value is what somebody is prepared to pay for it. If the hon. Gentleman would like to take a little longer to consider the market and the situation of the factory, I think that he will agree with every adviser who has been asked to give an opinion that this is a remarkably good deal. Such a sum, and an undertaking to build a new factory on the same site, is a remarkable deal. I hope, although as a customer I am anxious to get the lowest possible price, that the company and the work force are so efficient that profits will be considerable. I hope that there will be enough to pay the company back so that it can be profitable and prosperous.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Is the Secretary of State aware that there are grave fears among employees in ROFs throughout the country except Leeds, where they will be worried about whether there will be redundancies there or at Newcastle? Does he agree that the fears that were expressed in Committee about two years ago have proved to be well founded time and again and that the Government have done tremendous harm during the past two years to the viability of ROFs? Would it not be best to drop the scheme altogether? Does he agree that the preferred option of selling the ROFs as a unit is not on?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate and understand that there have been considerable uncertainties and fears for those who work in ROFs. That is inseparable from the difficult business of trying to move it into the private sector. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's assessment of what has happened to the efficiency of Royal Ordnance. It is very much more efficient, even now, than a few years ago. That offers a much better prospect for the future because it means that there are much better prospects of getting orders from overseas. I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will agree that my intention to get Royal Ordnance into the private sector, if possible as a whole, is very much in the interests of his constituents.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Is the Secretary of State aware of the appalling damage to the morale of all of the work force of ROFs that has been done by him and his predecessors during the past six years, in which orders have been lost and thousands of employees have lost their jobs? That should be compared with the record of the Labour Government. As parliamentary answers show, employment in ROFs rose under Labour.

Would Vickers have agreed the deal if the undertaking to build the additional plant at Leeds had been legally binding? What is the future for the Blackburn factory? If the right hon. Gentleman intends to sell off the rest of the ROFs as a single entity why, so many months after the event, has he still not published the opening balance sheet for ROF plc, dated 2 January 1985, or the trading results for 1985, when both would have been available if a prospectus had been issued?

Mr. Younger: I know of the hon. Gentleman's great interest, especially in the Blackburn factory, which is in his constituency. What he said about morale is quite right. The only way in which to put it right is to get the company settled in its new organisation. If it is possible, I want it to be put into the private sector as a whole as it stands. I hope that that will be possible, but I cannot guarantee it.

We have had several expressions of interest from firms and organisations which would like to place a bid for Royal Ordnance as a whole. They will be evaluated. I assure the hon. Gentleman that that will be done as quickly as possible. All the necessary information, including balance sheets, for example, will have to be produced.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Will the right hon. Gentleman now answer the question asked by the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), which he carefully failed to answer? Is it not the case that the board recommended against the sale and, despite some discreet but heavy arm-twisting, is still generally against it? Will he remember that many of us in the Select Committee predicted that this would happen, so diminishing rather than increasing competition? Is it not a part of the deal that the ROF has agreed not to set up any alternative tank-building facility anywhere in Britain?

Mr. Younger: That has not been put to the Royal Ordnance board, but I can confirm that it has agreed to the deal.

Mr. Ashdown: Did it recommend the deal?

Mr. Younger: It has agreed to the deal.

Mr. Ashdown: Did it recommend it?

Mr. Younger: I do not know what the difference is. I have made it perfectly clear that this was a negotiation between the Ministry of Defence and Vickers. The board has been kept informed throughout and has agreed that it can accept the deal.

Mr. Ashdown: What did the board recommend?

Mr. Younger: I am trying to answer the question. There have been several suggestions, deals or proposals, but they have been turned down by the Ministry of Defence or the Royal Ordnance board; but they are not relevant to this case. This recommendation has been put to the Royal Ordnance board as a result of negotiation between the Ministry of Defence and Vickers. The board has accepted it. That is the important point.

Unipart and Leyland Bus

5.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): On 6 February, I informed the House that it was the Government's intention, with the agreement of the Rover group board, that negotiations should be pursued for the separate privatisation of Unipart by the early placement of shares with United Kingdom institutions.

With the approval of the Government, the Rover group has reached agreement in principle, subject to contract, for the sale of a 75 per cent. shareholding in Unipart to a consortium comprising Unipart management and a group of United Kingdom investment institutions led by Charterhouse bank. It is proposed to reserve up to 5 per cent. of the ordinary share capital for Unipart employees. Rover group would receive up to £50 million, depending in part on Unipart's future performance. The Rover group would subscribe up to £3·75 million for equity in the restructured company.

Rover group's links with Unipart will be retained through its holding in Unipart, and by contractual arrangements agreed between Austin Rover group and Unipart. Return to the private sector should enable Unipart to develop and diversify its operations, while continuing to meet the requirements of Rover group.

On Leyland Bus, my hon. Friend the Minister of State informed the House on 27 June that the Rover group had received tenders for Leyland Bus from Aveling Barford, and Laird group, and a Leyland Bus management consortium.

The Rover group has recommended, and the Government have agreed, that the tender from the management consortium should be taken forward.

The Rover group has therefore reached agreement in principle, subject to contract, for the sale of Leyland Bus and a 33 per cent. shareholding in Leyland Parts to a consortium of Leyland Bus management and investment institutions. It is also proposed that employees will be able to participate in the shares of the new Leyland Bus holding company. The Rover group would receive about £11·7 million for Leyland Bus and the shareholding in Leyland Parts. The details of the sale contract remain to be negotiated.

As I have consistently made clear to the House, there is substantial overcapacity in the traditional bus market and some measure of rationalisation would be inevitable under whatever ownership. It is the intention of the management team to decide urgently on the most effective new structure for their manufacturing operations, and on employment levels. Some job losses will be involved, including the future closure of Eastern Coach Works at Lowestoft. However, the Government accept the view of the Rover group that the proposals by Leyland Bus management are soundly based and provide an opportunity to develop a viable bus manufacturing operation.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Why does it make sense to amputate 75 per cent. of Unipart, which is a successful and integrated operation, from the rest of the Rover group? If it is desirable to diversify the development of Unipart, why can that not be done with it remaining wholly in the ownership of the Rover group? Is it another example of the Government's ideological obsession with selling off all the profitable parts of the public sector? Will the Secretary of State tell the House more about the price? How much is to be paid now and how much in the future? How is the price related to future profitability and what will be the capital of the restructured company?

Will the Secretary of State confirm that, in plain language, his ominous references to the rationalisation of Leyland Bus and to new employment levels mean many job losses, starting with the depressing loss of the entire plant at Eastern Coach Works in Lowestoft? How many jobs will go in all?

Does the Secretary of State now appreciate the catastrophic results of the Government's public transport policy? This is not an example of a cyclical fluctuation of demand, or of an industry in structural decline. The reduction in bus orders from 5,801 in 1980 to a projected 1,850 in 1986 results directly from the ending of the bus grant, deregulation proposals and the ending of revenue support for bus services. The jobs which will be lost are the direct result of a transport policy which has not only ruined public transport but, as we have seen today, has meant that a successful bus industry is in danger of disappearing.

In such circumstances, is it not the Government's duty to give special help and support to the areas and individuals who have suffered, and who will suffer, and to help the new company as it seeks to grapple with problems caused by the Government?

The Government should have retained Leyland Bus in the Rover group so that, as an integrated operation, it could have the best chance of success. However, as the Government were determined, whatever the arguments, to sell off Leyland Bus, Opposition Members prefer the management-trade union consortium to the other bidders.

Why does the Secretary of State, curiously, refer only to the participation of the management and investment institutions? Why does he not refer to the participation of Unity Trust, the trade union financial institution which represents all the employees in the trade unions at the plant? Will the Secretary of State undertake that the Government will not put any obstacles in the way of Unity Trust's successful involvement in the company?

Finally, when does the Secretary of State think that he can come to the Dispatch Box without a message of industrial contraction and ever-increasing job losses?

Mr. Channon: I shall try to answer the points raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. First, I shall try to give him details of the price of Unipart. Under the terms of the deal, approximately £50 million will be paid to the groups; of this, £30 million will be payable on completion, with a deferred element of £5 million plus interest from the marketing of Unipart shares, and up to £15 million if Unipart achieves specified future profit targets. Those are the parameters within which the deal has been structured. I do not agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I believe that Unipart could have a very flourishing future in the private sector; that view is widely shared by Conservative Members.

I have never disguised from the House that there are serious problems in the bus industry. They would remain whether Leyland Bus was in public or in private ownership, and it is quite irresponsible of any hon. Members to say otherwise. There have been considerable changes in the bus market over a period of years. A new type of bus seems to be emerging as the probable bus of the future. I am sure that Leyland Bus's future management will be watching those developments carefully. It would not be right to retain Leyland Bus within the Leyland company. It would have a much better chance under the control and ownership of the management buy-out. I have been told today that Unity Trust is seriously interested in participating, and if that is so, it is something which I very much welcome. I am sure that the House will join me in hoping that the consortium will be successful in the future.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): As one who has pressed privately and publicly for this, the optimum decision, in terms of the offers made, to be taken, I welcome this decision greatly, and it will be welcomed by my constituents who work in the Leyland Bus factory in Farington in South Wirral. Is not that a tribute to the management team led by Ian McKinnon, and the trade union team led by Derek Bullen, who have invested so much time, trouble and now presumably money in securing the long-term future of Leyland Bus? I thank particularly my right hon. Friend, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who have listened carefully to the points of view of all involved.

Does the Secretary of State agree that there are still difficult decisions to be taken? Does he also agree that the joint approach of trade unions, management and others which has so characterised the campaign of the management buy-out offer, should be used to good effect to ensure that the rationalisation of the company is sensitive and productive and secures it a long-term and viable future?

Mr. Channon: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for welcoming these proposals. He has been a doughty fighter for his constituency and for this company which is located there. A great deal of credit must go to my hon. Friend for this result. I share my hon. Friend's views about the quality of the management and about Mr. McKinnon. I tried to support Mr. McKinnon and his colleagues in Thailand a little while ago in my previous job, and I shall do what I can to continue helping them. I have already told the House that difficult decisions will have to be taken, but I have every confidence that the new structure of the company will provide a good method for creating a viable bus manufacturing industry.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I welcome the Government's decision to reject the Laird bid which, in effect, would have closed the Leyland Bus plant in Workington. However, although I wish that Leyland Bus had been retained, reporting directly to the Rover board, I accept that the management consortium's proposals secure the future of the Leyland Bus plant in my constituency. I look forward to the future and ask the Secretary of State to do so too.
